“I doubt whether any general rule can be deduced from the authorities, and whether circumstances can be eliminated from consideration. But I was much pressed by counsel for the Corporation with the two cases of Grant v. Caledonian Railway Company, 9 Macph. 258, and Hastie v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1907, S. C. 1102, and it was maintained that these decisions establish clearly, that, if parents send out their children of tender years unattended, they must accept the consequences of their being regarded as impliedly able to take care of themselves, or in pari casu with adults. There is no doubt that in Grant's case, Lord Ardmillan's statement, that the child was either so young as not to be able to take care of herself, in which case she ought not to have been permitted to be at the place in question, a dangerous level railway crossing, or she was capable of taking care of herself and so on an equal footing with other passengers crossing the line, and therefore that in either view the company were not liable, was generally accepted by the Court. And the expressions used in the decision inquiry. A public park was in the same position as a public street, in July 2, 1908. so far as the responsibility of the defenders was concerned, and if there was a hidden danger they were liable if they had failed to take precautions to obviate it.¹ The special circumstances with regard to the river which placed on the defenders the duty of fencing it were, its liability to flood, the rapidity of its flow when flooded, and the fact of its bank being worn away.

Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow.

At advising on 2d July 1908,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The Lord Ordinary has given a very careful and full exposition of the authorities bearing on this question, and other cognate questions of liability in cases where there is a duty to the public to give protection against possible accidental injury.

I am unwilling to differ from the Lord Ordinary on a question of relevancy, where the effect of his decision is only to send the case to trial. On the of Hastie's case, though more general, are if anything even stronger in favour of the duty of parents to attend their children or to keep them at home. Yet I cannot think that either of these cases can be founded on as determining as a general proposition, independent of circumstances, that the child of tender years must go attended, under the sanction of being treated as an adult if it is not so attended. A large number of cases have occurred which cannot possibly be explained consistently with such a general proposition, and it must, I think, be admitted that circumstances modify the answer to be given to the above question in every case, and prevent the adoption of any general rule.

"I would refer particularly to the case of Morran v. Waddell, 11 R. 44, where the Lord President (Inglis), who had taken part in the decision in Grant's case supra, with reference to 'doubts which appear to exist in certain quarters as to the sort of liability which attaches to children and adults, in different sets of circumstances, in regard to cases of this kind,' thus explains the decision in Grant's case,—'In Grant v. The Caledonian Railway, we held that there was no distinction between the case of a child and of an adult in the circumstances then occurring, because at the level crossing, where the child was killed, the railway company were, in the exercise of their undoubted right, in use to run trains at a very high rate of speed, and the business of the railway company could not have been conducted if they had not been so entitled to run them. The result was that it was impossible to take precautions for children of a different kind from those taken for adults; and therefore when an accident arose from the passing of a train at a high rate of speed it was impossible to make a distinction between the two cases. But that law is not of universal application, and if I had been directing a jury in the present case, I should not have given them the law of the case of Grant. In this case it was, in the first place, not necessary for the train to travel at a high rate of speed, and it was not the practice so to travel—in fact, four miles an hour seems to have been the ordinary rate; and, in the second place, it is evident that a great many children are in the habit of playing about near the line; and, therefore, combining these two facts, there was a duty on the part of the defenders to keep a look out, and to avoid the chance of accident.' But then upon the evidence, his Lordship found that there was no negligence or want of due care on the part of the owner of a private railway, while, on the other hand, there was carelessness on the part of parents in allowing a child of tender years to wander about in a dangerous place unattended.

"The cases where the accident could not have occurred but for trespass,

July 2, 1908. other hand, it must be remembered that in our practice the presiding Judge at a trial has not the same powers as are exercised by Judges in the English Courts, in relation to withdrawing a case from the jury where the evidence of the plaintiff does not amount to a prima facie case of liability.

Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow. It is, however, within our province to examine the relevancy of the pursuer's averments, and to consider whether, if these were proved, liability would attach to the defender. In both countries the control of the Court is maintained on the general question of liability, though the forms of process are different.

Lord M'Laren.

In this case the Corporation of Glasgow are proprietors of the Botanic Garden, which is a place of recreation open to the public, and I do not doubt that the Corporation, as proprietors, are bound to give reasonable protection to members of the public against unusual or unseen sources of even though the trespass was that of children, may I think be disregarded—Galloway v. King, 10 Macph. 788, and Ross, 16 R. 86.

"The case of Grant, supra, where it was the business of the railway company to run its trains at high speed, and its statutory right to have a level crossing over an occupation road, may be contrasted with Morran, supra, Haughton, 20 R. 113, and Innes, 3 F. 335, where the proximity of dwellings to railway sidings, and the known habit of children to frequent these sidings, were held to impose a certain degree of responsibility on the railway company in conducting shunting operations for the safety of such children, though there is considerable diversity of opinion expressed by members of the bench on this branch of the subject.

"Then there is the series of cases regarding dangerous machinery left unfenced, a consideration of which must, I think, result in the conclusion that it is one of the duties of the owner of such machinery to regard the probability of children tampering with it, and also the fact that children can neither be always in leading strings, nor be credited with the sense of the adult. I refer to Campbell v. Ord & Maddison, 1 R. 149; M'Gregor, 10 R. 725; Clarke v. Chambers, L. R., 3 Q. B. D., per Cockburn, L. C.-J., at p. 339; Sharp v. Pathhead Spinning Company, 12 R. 574; and Findlay v. Angus, 14 R. 312. The latter case is, I think, particularly deserving of consideration with reference to the present. On a waste piece of ground where a fish curer was allowed to put up a shed without objection, and where the public were tolerated and children allowed to play, and where consequently there was the possibility of children tampering with the shed, its owner was held bound to take this into consideration in providing for its secure closing—while had trespass been necessary to enable the children to get at the shed, it was indicated that the result of the case might have been different.

"Lastly, there are the cases where the duty of local authorities in fencing dangerous places, as for instance dangers along the sides of roads, has been in question. Greer v. Stirlingshire Road Trustees, 9 R. 1069; Forbes, 15 R. 323; and Gibson v. Glasgow Police Commissioners, supra, which cannot be read without reaching the conclusion that the question what is a sufficient fence is not a general question, but a question dependent entirely on surrounding circumstances, and that these same circumstances may require special precautions for the safety of children to be taken, on the assumption that it is impossible to expect that children of tender years are never to be allowed to go at large unattended. In this connection I may also refer to Martin, 14 R. 814, where children were driven over on the public road, and it was held to be the duty of a driver to anticipate that children do frequent the public roads and streets unattended.

"I come then to the present case. The Corporation's Botanic Gardens danger, should such exist. But in a town, as well as in the country, there are physical features which may be productive of injury to careless persons or to young children against which it is impossible to guard by protective measures. The situation of a town on the banks of a river is a familiar feature; and whether the stream be sluggish like the Clyde at Glasgow, or swift and variable like the Ness at Inverness, or the Tay at Perth, there is always danger to the individual who may be so unfortunate as to fall into the stream. But in none of these places has it been found necessary to fence the river to prevent children or careless persons from falling into the water. Now, as the common law is just the formal statement of the results and conclusions of the common sense of mankind, I come without difficulty to the conclusion that precautions which have been rejected by common sense as unnecessary and inconvenient are not required by the law. If it could be shewn that there was any special danger at the place where the child fell into the water, the case would be different, but I am unable to find in the averments anything more definite than this, that the garden is bounded by a running stream which it was the duty of the Corporation to fence. If there is no such duty in general, then the action must fail. I think this case is ruled by the case of Hastie v. Magistrates of Edinburgh,¹ recently decided by this Division of the Court in regard to the obligation to fence a piece of ornamental water. The suggested distinction between the case of standing water and that of running water is not one that commends itself to my mind.

LORD KINNEAR.—In this action the question is stated quite clearly in are admittedly a public park, where children are in use to play,—I think I may say, are intended and impliedly invited to play. If so, I think that the Corporation are bound to take all necessary precautions that they shall be able so to play in safety. Though there may be cases, e.g., Grant's, supra, where the parent may have the duty of tending the child, if it is sent to the place of danger, I do not think that the Corporation can expect children to be always tended when playing in a public park, or that any blame attaches to parents for sending them there unattended. It may be that in the Edinburgh case (Hastie, supra) the circumstances did not on the face of them call for any special protection, and that there was therefore no relevant case to send to trial. But in the present case the circumstances bear just such a different complexion that I think there is issuable matter. A running stream liable to flooding is a different thing from an artificial sheet of stagnant water. And therefore here it is a fair question for a jury, whether the circumstances called for special measures for protection of children, who it must have been known would be unattended, being taken, and whether such precautions were in fact taken. The case is in pari casu with that of the Magistrates of Clydebank, 15 S. L. T. 886, to my judgment in which, to avoid repetition, I refer.

“As to the possibility of contributory negligence on the part of a child, that is a question of fact which cannot be decided on the relevancy. I think it is as much a question of fact for the jury in the case of a child as in that of an adult, and depends, inter alia, on the capacity of the child—Campbell v. Ord & Maddison, supra, per L. J.-C. Moncreiff, and Fraser v. Edinburgh Street Tramways Company, 10 R. 264.

July 2, 1908. the first sentence of the Lord Ordinary's opinion, where he says,—“Duncan Stevenson v. Stevenson, iron-turner, Glasgow, sues the Corporation of the City of Glasgow for damages for the death of his infant son, who fell into the River Kelvin, while playing in the Botanic Gardens, Glasgow, through which Lord Kinnear. that river runs, and which are admittedly the property of the Corporation, and are used as a public park. The pursuer alleges that his child was playing at the time of the accident with a number of other young children in the Botanic Gardens, and fell into the river at a place where it is unfenced, and he adds that ‘it was well known to the defenders that large numbers of children resorted to the said place for the purpose of recreation.’ The ground of liability alleged is the failure of the Corporation to have the bank of the River Kelvin fenced at the spot in question.” That is the fault attributed to the Corporation. The Lord Ordinary has held that that is a relevant ground of action, and has accordingly allowed an issue.

I am sorry to say that I am unable to agree with his Lordship. I cannot see any ground in law for casting upon the Corporation the duty which they are said to have neglected. It was said that this is a question of negligence, and that this is always a question for a jury, which is the only proper tribunal by which it can be tried. I cannot assent to that view. Whether the defender has or has not been negligent in point of fact in a particular case is a question for a jury, but there is, first of all, upon the relevancy of the record a question whether the negligence alleged constitutes a ground of legal liability, and that is a question for the Court. The distinction is stated by Lord Cairns in the case of *Metropolitan Railway Company v. Jackson*¹ in the House of Lords. His Lordship says there with reference to a case of negligence,—“The Judge has a certain duty to discharge, and the jurors have another and a different duty. The Judge has to say whether any facts have been established by evidence, from which negligence may be reasonably inferred; the jurors have to say whether from these facts, when submitted to them, negligence ought to be inferred. It is, in my opinion, of the greatest importance, in the administration of justice, that these separate functions should be maintained, and should be maintained distinct. It would be a serious inroad on the province of the jury if, in a case where there are facts from which negligence may reasonably be inferred, the Judge were to withdraw the case from the jury upon the ground that, in his opinion, negligence ought not to be inferred, and it would, on the other hand, place in the hands of the jurors a power which might be exercised in the most arbitrary manner if they were at liberty to hold that negligence might be inferred from any state of facts whatever”; and then his Lordship figures various cases in which, if this liberty were allowed to them, juries might go wrong, and he points out that in such cases an application to the Court on the ground that the verdict was against evidence would be a very imperfect remedy, because such an application, even if successful, could only result in a new trial, and on a second trial, or even on subsequent trials, the same thing might happen again. Then at a later part of his opinion he repeats the rule which he had already laid down, and says, after considering a previous decision which had been cited to the contrary,—“It is, indeed, impossible to lay down any rule except that which at the outset I referred to, viz, that from any given state of facts the Judge must say whether negligence can be legitimately inferred, and the jury whether it ought to be inferred.” Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow.

Now, the law so laid down is common to both countries, and binding upon us, but in its application to the procedure in a particular case we must, of course, refer to our own practice, and not to the entirely different procedure in the course of which the question arose which the House had to determine. The opinion of Lord Cairns assumes that a case has been brought to trial, and determines the conditions upon which it may be withdrawn from the jury by the presiding Judge. But it would appear that the learned Judges in England have a power of withdrawing cases from juries after the cases have gone to trial which this Court has not been accustomed to exercise, and it must be observed that a Judge of this Court is not at liberty to adopt of his own authority a new form of procedure, however useful in itself, and however it may be justified by English practice. Trial by jury in civil causes is introduced into our system by comparatively recent statutes, and the procedure is fixed by statutory enactments which the Court is bound to follow. Therefore in the application of the law laid down by the Lord Chancellor we must consider it at the stage in the procedure where we can give it full effect, and that is in the consideration of the relevancy of the pursuer's ground of action, because when this Court has once allowed an issue on the ground that the facts averred by the pursuer are relevant, we have decided that if these facts and no more are proved in evidence, there is a question of negligence for the jury, and no Judge at the trial can, contrary to that decision, say that, assuming the facts as alleged to be true, there is no case for a jury. That is decided, and therefore it must be decided with due care and deliberation at the proper stage, before we allow an issue at all. We must assume, for the purpose of the decision, that the facts are true and that they are all the facts that the pursuer is prepared to prove, and upon that assumption we have to say whether he has made a good case of legal liability for what he alleges to be the negligence of the defender.

Now, that question involves two factors. In the first place, before we can say there is negligence we must say that the law, in the circumstances alleged, imposes a duty on the defender to take precautions for the safety of others, and, in the second place, that there has been, according to the allegations, a breach of that duty. Considering the first of these two points, I am unable to hold that there is any allegation of duty on the part of the Corporation which they can be said to have neglected. The duty supposed is that wherever there is a public park, through which a small stream of a kind with which we are familiar may flow, it is the duty of the owners and managers of such park to protect the stream by fences so that anybody using the park or garden cannot fall into it. No authority was cited for that proposition, and for myself I know no rule or principle of law upon which it can be maintained. The proposition, on which it is sought to raise a duty against the defenders, is that they are the owners and managers of a public garden. But they are not bound in that character to insure the safety of persons who resort to their garden. I see no ground for extend-

July 2, 1908. ing the liability of the occupiers of real property as such beyond the limits defined in the case of Indermaur v. Dames.¹ That concerned the duty of Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow. of the occupiers of property with reference to persons resorting thereto upon their invitation, expressed or implied, and I assume that that is the position Lord Kinnear. of the present pursuer, or of his child. I think it would be quite unreasonable to treat his child, or anybody else resorting to the Botanic Gardens in Glasgow, as if they were trespassers or mere licencees, but I think they belong to the class which is defined in *Indermaur v. Dames*¹ as including persons who go upon the property, not as mere licencees or volunteers or guests, or as persons whose employment is such that the danger may be considered as bargained for, but who go upon business which concerns the occupier, and upon his invitation, express or implied, and with reference to such visitors the law laid down in the case is this,²—"We consider it settled law that" such visitor, "using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall, on his part, use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger which he knows, or ought to know"—and which the other party does not know—"and that where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as matter of fact."

There are two points in that statement of the law which require consideration. The first is this, that a person going upon property, even by invitation, express or implied, is expected to use reasonable care for his own safety. He is to look out for all the ordinary risks that are necessarily incident to the kind of property that he is going upon, but, on the other hand, it is held that he is not to be exposed to any unusual danger known to the proprietor, and not known to people who may come upon premises with which they are not familiar. If that be the law, it seems to me clear enough that it imposes no duty upon the owners or managers of public parks to fence every stream of water or every pond which may happen to be found in a public garden. Everybody resorting to the garden knows about these things as well as the owner and occupier himself. They are very obvious and patent, they are on the surface, and if there is any danger attached to them it is a danger from which the people resorting to the garden may reasonably be expected to protect themselves. There is probably no appreciable danger for ordinary people, but then the first point of the judgment to which I have already adverted, to wit, that the owner of the property is entitled to expect his visitors to take reasonable care of themselves, serves to shew that the precautions that he has to take in the construction and arrangement of his property are such as he ought to take on the assumption that the people coming to it are persons of average intelligence and average capacity for looking after themselves. If there be a special danger arising from the want of intelligence, or immature intelligence, of the visiting persons, the principle laid down in *Indermaur v. Dames*¹ will not serve to impose upon occupiers liability for such exceptional risk as that. I do not suppose that in this case anybody would maintain that a full-grown person would have an action of damages against the Corporation of Glasgow because he had fallen into the Kelvin in the Botanic Gardens, or that he was entitled to expect that so dangerous a stream should be fenced for his protection. Cor- July 2, 1908.

Stevenson v.
Corporation of Glasgow.

But then it was said that this was not the case of a man, but the case of a child who is naturally helpless, who has not sufficient intelligence to know of the danger to which it is exposed, or sufficient capacity to protect itself if it did know of it. But there is no authority for imposing on the proprietors or managers of public parks a duty to protect children from such risks as are incident to their childhood. The only cases cited which have a direct bearing upon the question are those of *Grant v. Caledonian Railway Company*¹ and Hastie v. Magistrates of Edinburgh,² both of which are directly in favour of the defenders in this case. In *Grant v. The Caledonian Railway Company*¹ there was a question as to whether a railway company had been guilty of negligence in running trains over a level-crossing, where an accommodation road crossed, so that a child of five or six years of age was run over. The Court held that the company had taken all the precautions which they could be required to take for the safety of persons of average intelligence and capacity, and that it was impossible to lay upon them the further duty of running their trains in such a way that a child of five or six years old who had not intelligence enough to look up and down the line so as to see whether a train was coming, or to get off the line when a train was obviously coming, might be made safe from harm, because the only way in which children of these tender years can be protected is by the constant supervision of their elders, who are charged with the duty of caring for them. It is obvious enough that no structural precautions will be sufficient to protect a child of two years old or three years old if it is left by itself in a public place. The only real security is that children who are too young to take care of themselves should be taken care of by somebody else. The question is whether the duty to take care of them is laid by law upon the Corporation of Glasgow, and I apprehend it is not.

The Lord Ordinary refers to a number of cases which he thinks are inconsistent with the case of Grant,¹ and supports the view that an exceptional duty is laid upon persons in the position of the defenders for the protection of children. But there is a clear distinction between the cases cited and the present. The law recognises that certain things are a source of extreme danger. A man who uses them must take care to avoid harming his neighbours, and for that purpose he must take precautions which are proportioned to the amount of danger. I have no doubt that persons charged with a duty of that kind must consider, so far as they have opportunity, the ability of those whom they put in danger to escape the harm to which they are exposed. The simplest cases and most quoted are those of danger arising from horses and carts or carriages. I have no doubt that if a driver of a carriage sees somebody crossing a road who is helpless from any cause, either from infirmity or old age, or blindness, or lameness, or from infancy, he is bound to take an especial precaution for the protection of such a person, because he sees a risk and it is in his power to protect against it, and if he runs

July 2, 1908. over such a helpless person, it is no defence to say that an active young man would have come to no harm. That is not the measure of his obligation. His duty is to avoid doing harm to people whom his own conduct has exposed to danger. It may or may not be an answer to say that if a child is in a place where it is run over its being there was due not to the carelessness of the driver but to the carelessness of somebody else. As at present advised I should think that not a good answer in the case supposed; but it is not a question that arises in this case. The difference is that in the case supposed, a man for his own purposes, however lawful, creates a danger for everybody who may be in the way, but a danger that may easily be avoided by one person, and only with difficulty, or not at all, by another. An analogous responsibility arises from the use of things in themselves dangerous, when they are not under the immediate control of those who use them. That has been held in a number of cases—where a man has left a horse and cart in a public street unattended and children have been hurt. He takes the risk of the danger arising from his neglect of the ordinary precaution to look after his horse and cart. There are a great many dangerous things of different kinds which raise the question in the same way—firearms, explosives, dangerous machines of all kinds. People who use these things are bound to take precautions to prevent their doing harm, because it is in the very nature of the thing that it will do harm, and I think the cases to which the Lord Ordinary refers as establishing a rule that greater precautions have to be taken in the case of children than in the case of adults, are all cases of that kind. The mere fact that a child was concerned in an accident does not make two cases in which it occurs so identical that any rule of law can be deduced from the decision without reference to the particular ground of liability which was found to be established in each case. The cases which the Lord Ordinary refers to, at the top of page 4, are cases where dangerous machines or dangerous instruments were left in public places without sufficient precaution being taken; therefore there is, to begin with, a wrong. Nobody is entitled to leave a dangerous machine in a public street or public market without taking good care that others are not to be hurt by it. Lord M'Laren suggests a wild animal. If you have anything that is dangerous under your control, you must take care that it does no harm. I do not consider it necessary to examine in detail all these cases. I believe they will all be found to rest upon that consideration, and that the question whether children or adults were hurt was quite immaterial to the decision, except in so far as a question may be raised of contributory negligence in the case of an adult which may not be raised in the case of a child. The negligence in these cases was such that the party charged with a duty to take due care would have been responsible whether the person actually injured was a child or an adult.

His Lordship refers especially to an opinion of Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn in Clarke v. Chambers,¹ and I do not think in the decisions you could find a clearer statement of the true principle than in the passage to which the Lord Ordinary refers. The case itself has really no bearing upon this question, not only because the person injured was an adult, but also because the case in question was of a kind with which we are not concerned. The July 2, 1908. owner of property had put upon his private road, upon which, however, Stevenson v. other persons were entitled to be, a barrier, part of which was armed with Corporation of spikes, so as to constitute what is called in the report chevaux de frise. Glasgow. Somebody passing at night took this part of the barrier from the centre of Lord Kinnear. the carriageway, where it had been placed by the owner, and put it upon the footpath, and a man, entitled to use the road, fell over it and was seriously injured by falling upon the spikes. The real question for decision there was one with which we have no concern, namely, whether the intervention of a third person, who removed the spikes from one part of the road to another, and so led to the risk which formed the ground of complaint, relieved the original wrongdoer. The Court held it did not, because he was not entitled to leave things on the road which might be tampered with by other persons so as to expose persons to danger. The Lord Ordinary refers to the case, I rather think, for the observations of Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn, and the passage to which he refers deals with a decision from which the Lord Chief-Justice dissents in the case of Mangan v. Atherton.¹ In that case it had been held that there was no liability maintainable against a man who had left an oilcake crushing-machine in a public place without throwing it out of gear, or fastening the handle, or leaving anybody to take care of it. Some children playing about the place began to move it—tampered with it. One of them began to turn the wheels, and another put his fingers into the cogs of the wheels and was crushed. The Court of Exchequer, before whom that question came, held there was no liability, because the children had no business there, and there was no negligence. The Lord Chief-Justice dissents from that, and I think he does so upon grounds which have been fully established. In the passage to which I understand the Lord Ordinary refers his Lordship says this:—"A man who leaves in a public place, along which persons, and amongst them children, have to pass, a dangerous machine which may be fatal to anyone who touches it, without any precaution against mischief, is not only guilty of negligence, but of negligence of a very reprehensible character, and not the less so because the imprudent and unauthorised act of another may be necessary to realise the mischief to which the unlawful act or negligence of the defendant has given occasion." I think nothing can bring out more clearly the distinction in question, because, to begin with, the man was doing an unlawful act when he put his dangerous machine there, and he must be responsible for all natural and probable consequences of his wrongdoing.

But that is not the condition of liability in the present case. There is nothing unlawful in making a public garden or in opening a garden to the public in a place where there are streams or ponds, and if the place is made safe for persons of average intelligence I know of no rule of law which requires the proprietors to take further precautions. It is impossible to lay upon the defenders a duty to protect children from risks which arise only from their own childishness and helplessness. That is the office of their parents or guardians.

Corporation of Glasgow.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordship. I think there is here no case to try. In my opinion this is one of the cases in which the defenders have succeeded in demonstrating that, assuming everything that the pursuer says on record is proved, there is no actionable wrong. The duty which is alleged to be incumbent on the defenders is to fence the River Kelvin, a natural stream, flowing through a public park. I think that there is less obligation to fence a natural stream than there is to fence an artificial pond, because an artificial pond is the creation of the owner of the ground. It has already been held in this Court that, in circumstances similar to those of the present case, there is no obligation to fence an artificial pond. The reason why there is no obligation to fence is because the danger is an obvious one. There may be cases in which it might be proper for a jury to say whether the danger was obvious or not—disused quarries and the like—but in the case of an artificial pond, or in the case of a natural stream, I do not think there is any case for a jury to pronounce upon.

It sufficiently appears that the proximate cause of the accident in the present case was not the existence of the river at all, but the fact that a child of tender years went there unattended. Now, upon that question it appears to me that if the child was in a position to take care of itself the same standard must be applied as would be applied in the case of an adult. If the child was so young as not to be able to take care of itself, it should never have been allowed to go there unattended, and the defenders cannot be made liable for an accident, the proximate cause of which was the fact that the child went there without an attendant. The only other observation I have to add is, that the case of Gibson,¹ which I understood to be pressed upon us on behalf of the pursuer, was one in which it was held the defenders had failed to discharge their duty to fence one of the public streets of Glasgow. The place there in question was a dangerous one, under certain conditions, for all who resorted there, adults as well as children, and, accordingly, that case was different from the present.

I am of opinion with your Lordships that no issue should be allowed in this case.

Husband and Wife—Bankruptcy—Loan to husband by wife out of her separate estate—Sequestration of Husband—Claim by Wife's Executor—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), section 1 (4).—The Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 1 (4), enacts—"Any money or other estate of the wife lent or entrusted to the husband, or immixed with his funds, shall be treated as assets of the

Mitchell's
Executor v.
Mitchell's
Trustee.

A wife lent to her husband a sum of money out of estate acquired by her under a deed of settlement, which excluded his jus mariti and right of administration. A year after the wife's death the husband was sequestrated, and, the loan not having been repaid, his wife's executor lodged a claim in the sequestration as an ordinary creditor for the amount of the debt.

Held (1) that section 1 (4) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, applied to money lent by a wife to her husband out of her separate estate, whether the jus mariti was excluded by deed or by the operation of the statute; (2) that the wife, at the date of her death, had merely a jus crediti liable to be defeated in the event of her husband's bankruptcy, and that her executor took no higher right; and, accordingly (3) that the claim by the wife's executor to an ordinary ranking fell to be disallowed, under reservation of the claimant's right to participate in any balance of the husband's estate after the claims of other creditors for value had been satisfied.

THE estates of William Hyslop Mitchell, draper, Aberdeen, were sequestrated on 2d October 1907. A claim was lodged in the sequestration by the bankrupt as executor-dative of the deceased Mrs Margaret Whyte or Mitchell, to be ranked as an ordinary creditor for the sum of £1405.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

The claim arose under the following circumstances :—The deceased Mrs Mitchell, who was married to the bankrupt in 1900, inherited a sum of money from her father, which, by his deed of settlement, was directed to be paid to and held by her "for her separate use, and exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration, and debts and deeds of her husband." The greater part of this money was lent by Mrs Mitchell to her husband, who, in return, granted a deed of acknowledgment, dated 31st January 1903. Mrs Mitchell died intestate on 17th December 1906, and was survived by her husband and by three children, the husband being appointed her executor. The claim put in by the bankrupt, as executor of his wife, was for the amount advanced by her to him, with interest.

On 27th February 1908 the trustee in the sequestration, Mr James R. Hodge, C.A., pronounced this deliverance :—"Rejects the claim to an ordinary ranking, but under reservation of the claimant's rights to participate in any balance of the estate remaining after the claims of the other creditors for money or money's worth have been satisfied." *

The claimant appealed to the Sheriff.

On 1st May 1908 the Sheriff-substitute (Young) recalled the deliverance, and appointed the trustee to rank the claimant in terms of his claim.†

* See the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 1 (4), quoted in rubric.

† "NOTE.—The ground upon which the trustee has . . . rejected the claim is, that Mrs Mitchell's funds were immixed with the funds of her husband, the bankrupt, and that consequently, in view of section 1 (4) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, no claim in respect of her advances can be admitted until the claims of the ordinary creditors have been met. This deliverance seems to me to be mistaken. We are not here dealing with a wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor in bankruptcy. When Mrs Mitchell died, on 17th December 1906, one-third of the funds to which she had right vested in her children as legitim, and one-third as dead's part, while the remaining third fell to her husband in virtue of his jus relictii. Mitchell's Executor v.
Mitchell's
Trustee.

The trustee appealed to the Court of Session.

Parties were heard on 24th June 1908.

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute had erred in holding that section 1 (4) of the Act was inapplicable. That section was general in its terms, and applied to property belonging to a wife, whether the jus mariti was excluded by deed or by force of the statute. The heirs in whom the wife's estate had vested had no higher right than their author,¹ and took her right to claim for the amount of the debt subject to the qualifications imposed by section 1 (4) of the Act.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) Section 1 (4) of the Act only applied to property of a wife from which the husband's rights were excluded by the operation of section 1 (1), and not to property held by her from which these rights were excluded by a private deed. The object of the Act was to remove disabilities, not to impose them, and it was not to be supposed that it intended to affect property over which the wife had absolute power independently of the Act. (2) The point of time at which to consider whether there was any "estate of the wife lent to the husband," within the meaning of subsection (4), was the date of the husband's sequestration. In the present case at that date there was no such estate, for all the wife's estate had vested in her heirs. The section only applied to cases where the husband was sequestrated in the wife's lifetime.*

LORD M'LAREN.—The question raised by this appeal is the construction of the 4th subsection of the 1st section of the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881.

[After a narrative of the facts.] The provision of the Married Women's Property Act, sec. 1 (4), on which the appeal depends has reference to "money, or other estate of the wife, lent or entrusted to the husband, or immixed with his funds." Such money or estate, it is said, "shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy" under the reservation, which the trustee has allowed, of a right to participate in the surplus, if the estate should prove to be solvent.

The Sheriff-substitute in his note explains his view of the statute, which seems to be that the statute only puts the wife under a personal disability to rank on her husband's estate, but does not affect the right of her representatives to rank on the husband's estate for their shares of legitim and dead's part.

I am unable to agree with the learned Sheriff-substitute in his suggested limitation of the statutory provision. If the provision had been that a claim by the wife in bankruptcy should be postponed to that of other which the trustee has declined to admit, is put forward on behalf of those who, by operation of law, acquired a vested beneficial interest in her estate long before the bankruptcy. In my judgment, then, the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, on which the trustee rests his deliverance, have no application to the case, and the executor ought to be ranked pari passu with ordinary creditors for the amount due on account of the said advances and interest, the right to the one-third which belongs to the bankrupt jure relictæ being reserved to the trustee."

creditors, there would be room for the argument that the provision was July 2, 1908.
 personal to the wife, and did not affect her representatives. But what the statute says is that money lent to the husband shall be treated as assets of his estate in bankruptcy, and if the money in question is assets of his estate it is of no consequence whether the claim to repayment is made by the wife herself or by her heirs or assignees, because in either case the money is affected by the statutory condition under which it is to be treated as husband's estate in a question with creditors for "money or money's worth."

Mitchell's
 Executor v.
 Mitchell's
 Trustee.
 Lord M'Laren.

If the defender were solvent, it would be open to the wife's executor to bring an action and to recover payment of the loan. But if the husband becomes insolvent, with the wife's money in his hands, the statute takes effect upon it, and fixes the quality of assets in bankruptcy upon the money lent, entrusted, or immixed with the husband's funds.

In the present case the wife's money was separate estate in her person in virtue of her father's will, and she did not need the aid of the statute to secure it to her independent of the jus mariti. I only mention this point that it may not be supposed that it was overlooked. In my opinion the provision of the 4th subsection is perfectly general and applies to all the wife's separate estate which she had power to retain or to lend to her husband, whether the estate came to her separate use vi statuti, or as a condition of a will or private grant.

I am therefore of opinion that we should sustain the appeal and affirm the deliverance of the trustee in the sequestration.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons as those given by your Lordship.

Two points are made by the respondent—the first being that to which your Lordship last referred. It is said that this lady's estate was expressly exempted from the jus mariti not by force of statute, but by the provisions of her father's settlement, and that accordingly she does not require to appeal to the statute, and is not bound by the conditions with which it qualifies the right which it confers. I agree that the answer is that the fourth subsection of section 1 is general in its terms, and applicable to the separate estates of all married women, irrespective of the sources from which that estate may have been derived. I assent to the observation which was made by the learned counsel for the respondent that you are not to read subsection (4) as if it stood by itself, but that it must be construed with reference to the context, and the whole scheme of the Act. But there is nothing in the purpose or general scheme of the Act to force any other than their natural meaning upon perfectly plain words.

The general purpose of the Act is to give married women in general the same exclusive right in their separate estate as was already secured to those whose estates were settled by deed upon themselves to the exclusion of the jus mariti. That being the primary purpose of the Act, I see no reason for presuming any intention to introduce a limitation of the right to the disadvantage of the particular class of married women whom the Act was specially intended to favour. The terms of all the other subsections of section 1 are plainly of general application. The first applies to all cases where "a marriage is contracted after the passing of this Act." The second subsection provides that "any income of such estate shall be payable to the wife on her individual receipt or to her order, and to this extent the husband's right of administration shall be excluded. . . ." That the words "such estate" refer to the moveable or personal estate of a wife acquired before or during a marriage contracted after the passing of the Act seems to me to be clear, and I cannot doubt that if a married woman's estate were settled by deed without express mention of the jus administrationis of the husband, that right would be excluded to the extent specified. Subsection (3) enacts—"Except as hereinafter provided, the wife's moveable estate shall not be subject to arrestment, or other diligence of the law, for the husband's debts, provided that the said estate . . . is invested, placed, or secured in the name of the wife herself, or in such terms as shall clearly distinguish the same from the estate of the husband." That again plainly applies to the estates of all married women. I see no reason why the fourth subsection, on which the present question depends, should be more restricted in its application. The ground, in policy, whatever it may have been, on which it was thought that a wife should not be allowed to compete with her husband's creditors in bankruptcy must be the same whether, as between the spouses themselves, the husband's rights are excluded by a deed of settlement or by operation of law. But at all events, the words of the Act cover both cases.

The second point rested on an argument of some subtlety, but I think fallacious. It was said that we were not concerned with the wife's money, but with the money of the children, and that the purpose of the Act was to regulate the patrimonial rights of the spouses during the marriage, but that it had nothing to do with the rights arising to either party on its dissolution—in this case by the death of the wife. It is common ground, however, that the wife's right to claim repayment of her advances is transmissible, and that it passes to her representatives or to her legatees. Now, if the statute makes no provision to the contrary, the legal character and effect of the transmission must be regulated by the ordinary rules of law, and her representatives must take her estate exactly as it stood in her, and not otherwise. The question therefore is what was the extent of the wife's claim upon the sequestrated estate, because that is the claim which has passed to her representatives or to her children exactly as it stood in her. The respondent sought to enforce his argument by a somewhat confused assumption that what passed to the children was the money. But the money remains at her death exactly where it was before—in the hands of the husband or of his trustee in bankruptcy. The representatives do not take a real right by mere survivance. What passes to them is a jus crediti. If the husband had been solvent, the wife's representatives would have had a good action for repayment of the money, but on his sequestration the right to the money passed to his trustee in bankruptcy; the right of the wife and her representatives was converted into a claim for a dividend, and she and they alike must take that claim under the condition which the statute imposes. If a similar condition had been stipulated by contract when the money was advanced, no one would doubt that the wife's stipulations would have been binding upon her representatives, and I think it makes no difference that the conditions of her claim are fixed by statute.

I am therefore entirely of the same opinion as your Lordship. I think July 2, 1908.
 the rights of the children are no higher than the rights of this lady herself, and that accordingly the trustee is entitled to deal with the claim exactly as if it had been made by the wife herself in her lifetime.

GEORGE RENNIE, Appellant.—F. C. Thomson.

No. 156.

July 3, 1908.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 13—Casual Employment—Employment for the purposes of the employer's trade or business.—A jobbing window cleaner was in use about once a month to clean the windows of the house of a medical practitioner, who used a portion of the house in connection with his professional practice. There was no formal contract between the parties, and the window cleaner called and did the work without receiving on each occasion a special invitation or special permission to do so. On one occasion while cleaning the window of the dining-room he fell and was injured.

Held that the window cleaner's employment was of a casual nature, and that he was not employed for the purposes of the employer's trade or business, and that he was, therefore, not entitled to compensation.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

In the stated case for appeal, the Sheriff-substitute found it proved:—“(1) That the respondent resides with his family at 7 Royal Crescent, Glasgow, and also uses a portion of the premises in connection with his professional practice. (2) That the appellant is a jobbing window cleaner, and that on 27th December 1907 he was cleaning the dining-room window in the respondent's said house, when he fell into the area, and sustained injuries which have since incapacitated him for pursuing his usual employment. (3) That his average weekly earnings were £1. (4) That for some years the appellant has been in the habit of cleaning the respondent's windows about once a month. (5) That the work occupied about three or four hours, and the appellant was paid 3s. 4d. on each occasion, being at the rate of 2d. per window. (6) That he did not wait for a special invitation on each occasion, nor did he ask special permission, but he called, was admitted, and did the work. (7) That there was no formal contract between the parties, and that the respondent might have engaged any other person to clean his windows, or might have refused the appellant admittance whenever he came prepared to clean the windows.”

On these facts the Sheriff-substitute found “that the appellant was a person whose employment was of a casual nature, and who was employed otherwise than for the purposes of the employer's trade or business"; and therefore assolzied the respondent, and found him entitled to expenses.*

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Was the appellant a workman in the employment of the respondent within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, so as to entitle him to compensation under said Act?"

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute's decision was erroneous. The employment was not of a casual nature. The appellant called regularly to clean the windows of the respondent's house, and there was an implied contract that he should do so. He came to do the work without being specially summoned, and the service did not depend on anything said or done on each particular occasion. These features of the case distinguished it from Hill v. Begg.¹ Further, even if the appellant's employment were held to be of a casual nature, he was nevertheless entitled to compensation. The appellant was engaged to clean all the windows of the house, and among these were the windows of a room used as a surgery. These facts were sufficient to satisfy the condition that the employment was for the purpose of the employer's business. This was illustrated by the fact that in the case of a house containing a surgery the Inland Revenue authorities allowed a deduction in the duties paid on the ground that the surgery was used in connection with a business or profession.

Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The question of law in this case is whether the appellant was a workman in the employment of the respondent within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, so as to entitle him to compensation under that Act. The Sheriff-substitute before whom the case came assolzied the respondent from the conclusions of the petition, and I am of opinion that he was right in so deciding the case.

The solution of the question depends upon the definition of "workman" contained in the thirteenth section of the Act. That section provides that "workman" "does not include . . . a person whose employment is of a casual nature, and who is employed otherwise than for the purposes of the employer's trade or business." Under this section, therefore, in order to entitle the appellant to compensation it is essential (first) that his employment should not have been of a casual nature, and (second) that it was for the purposes of the respondent's business. Both of these conditions must be present.

Now, with reference to the first of these requirements, the facts as found in the case are that the appellant did not wait for a special invitation on each occasion, nor did he ask special permission, but called at the respondent's house, was admitted, and did the work. There was no formal contract between the parties, and the respondent might have engaged other persons to clean the windows, and might have refused the appellant admittance whenever he came prepared to clean the windows. Could there be a more typical example of employment of a casual nature than this? The appellant went to the respondent's house on each occasion on the chance of being permitted to clean the windows. That chance was no doubt a good one, but it cannot possibly be said that the employment was, to use the words of Buckley, L. J., in Hill v. Begg,¹ either permanent or periodic. Accordingly, I think that the appellant has failed to shew that his employment was other than of a casual nature.

Rennie v. Reid.
LdStormonth-Darling.

Further, I am of opinion that the appellant was not employed for the purposes of the respondent's business. It was argued that the fact that the appellant cleaned the windows of the rooms in the house used by the respondent in connection with his medical practice was sufficient to satisfy this requirement. I cannot agree with this argument, and in my opinion it would be absurd to make the respondent's liability to compensate the appellant turn upon the question whether the appellant had or had not, on the particular occasions on which he went to the house, cleaned the windows of the surgery as well as the other windows of the house. Essentially the employment was in connection with the respondent's private residence, and not for the purposes of his business. On the whole matter, I am of opinion that we should answer the question of law in the negative.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. The facts stated by the Sheriff in the case shew clearly that there never was a standing contract or one for the future between the appellant and the respondent, but that on each occasion upon which the former called at the latter's house an implied contract was entered into between them applicable only to that particular occasion. It is no doubt true that the appellant had reasonable grounds for believing that he would be employed when, in ordinary course, he called at the respondent's house. That he was probably justified in expecting, but certainly he had no right to demand employment. It appears to me that, strictly regarded, his calling at the house was on each occasion an application for employment, and his admission by the respondent's servant an acceptance on the respondent's part of his application. I therefore have no hesitation in holding that the employment was of a casual nature.

Mr Thomson, however, contended further that, even if that was so, the appellant was none the less a "workman" within the meaning of section 13 of the Act, because he was employed "for the purposes of the employer's trade or business." It seems to me that to say that a window cleaner who cleans the windows of a doctor's house, among them being the windows of his surgery or consulting-room, is employed for the purposes of the doctor's trade or business, is straining the language of the Act beyond all sense and reason.

I will only add that I concur in the opinions delivered by the learned Judges in the English case of Hill v. Begg,¹ which was cited to us, and

July 4, 1908. MRS ELIZABETH WEBSTER MACDONALD or GILL, Defender (Appellant).
 Dunbar v. Gill. —D.-F. Campbell—Munro.

Lease—Long Lease—Right in security—Assignment in security of long lease—Action of mailles and duties—Competency—Statute—Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 26), secs. 6 and 20—Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 2.—The Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, which provides for the recording of long leases, and for the granting of assignments in security of such recorded leases, enacts, sec. 6, that the creditor or party in right of such assignment in security “shall be entitled, in default of payment” of capital or interest, to apply to the Sheriff for a warrant to enter on possession, and that such warrant, if granted, “shall be a sufficient title for such creditor or party to enter into possession of such lands and heritages, and to uplift the rents from any subtenants therein.”

Held that as the statute, in giving to the person in right of such assignment in security a right to enter on possession and uplift the rents, had provided a special procedure for his doing so, it by implication excluded any other mode of procedure, and that an action of mailles and duties at his instance was incompetent.

Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn. By lease, dated August 1866, the Earl of Seafield leased to James M’Gillivray, certain subjects in Grantown, known as Parkburn House, for the period of nineteen years from Whitsunday 1850, with an obligation to renew the lease for seven further periods of nineteen years each, and the lease was duly recorded. In 1874, James M’Gillivray, by a recorded assignment and conveyance, assigned the lease to Marmaduke Gill. In 1894 Marmaduke Gill sold the lease to Dr William Gill, who died in 1906, leaving as his sole executor and trustee, his widow, Mrs Elizabeth Webster Macdonald or Gill.

By a duly recorded bond and assignment in security, dated March 1877, which contained an assignment of the rents, Marmaduke Gill had assigned the lease to William Grant, in security of a loan of £700, and in 1882, by a recorded translation and assignment, William Grant transferred his rights as creditor under that bond and assignment to Miss Alexandrina Dunbar.

In May 1907 Miss Alexandrina Dunbar brought an action of mailles and duties, in ordinary form, in the Sheriff Court at Elgin, against Mrs Elizabeth Webster Macdonald or Gill and the subtenant in occupation of the subjects of the lease, in which the pursuer averred that the principal sum due under the bond had not been repaid, and that the interest had fallen into arrear, and craved the Court to ordain the subtenants to pay their rents, mailles, and duties to Miss Dunbar. The pursuer’s condescendence contained a reference to the original lease, and to the assignations and translations thereof, July 4, 1908. but contained no averment that the original lease had ever been renewed by the Earl of Seafield or his representatives.

Gill.

The subtenants did not appear to defend the action, but defences were lodged for Mrs Gill, in which she averred:—"Explained that the lease specified in said deeds was a lease for the space of nineteen years from the term of Whitsunday 1850, and it had lapsed and come to an end prior to the date of the bond and assignation in security founded on. The pursuer was never in possession of the subjects, and never had any real right, and she has no valid right or title to uplift the rents of the subjects." She also lodged a statement of facts which, besides containing statements dealing with the merits of the cause, contained this averment:—"This defender is the executrix and trustee of the deceased Dr William Gill, who resided at Beech House, Radcliffe, Lancashire, and who, at the time of his death in the year 1906, was owner of heritable subjects at Grantown-on-Spey, known as Parkburn House, and of which subjects the other defenders are tenants."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer being entitled, in virtue of said bond and assignation in security, to enter into possession of said subjects and uplift the rents thereof, decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer has no title to sue. (3) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the prayer of the petition. (7) The pursuer not being entitled, in virtue of the bond and assignation in security libelled, to enter into possession of the subjects and uplift the rents thereof, the action should be dismissed, and this defender found entitled to expenses.

On 8th July 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Webster), after a debate on the relevancy, allowed a proof, and on appeal the Sheriff (Wilson) affirmed that interlocutor. Thereafter the defender lodged a minute departing from the defences which involved matters of proof, and on 5th November 1907 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor decerning against the defenders in terms of the prayer of the petition.*

The comparing defender appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division on 1st July 1908.

Argued, inter alia, for the defender and appellant;—(1) The pursuer had failed to set forth any relevant averment that she was entitled to uplift these subrents. She could only do so as the assignee of a security validly created, by virtue of the Registration of Leases Act, 1857,† over a registrable long lease, viz., a lease for thirty-one years. The lease here was ex facie only for nineteen years, and was only registrable on the ground that there was an obligation to renew which would bring it over the necessary thirty-one years.¹ But at the date of the assignation in security in question here—viz., 1877—the original nineteen years had expired, and the lease had presumably lapsed, and there was no averment on record that the lease had been renewed, nor was there any averment from which such a renewal could be inferred. In the absence of such averments it was not to be presumed that this was either a validly registered lease, or that there was any lease whatever in existence at the date of the alleged assignation in security, and therefore the pursuer had failed to set forth a relevant title. (2) Even if the pursuer had a right to uplift these subrents she could not enforce that right by an action of mails and duties, but must follow the statutory procedure for attaching subrents provided by section 6 of the Registration of Leases Act. The pursuer here was not founding on a common law right of security, but solely on a statutory right, and if she desired to take the benefits of the statute she must strictly follow the procedure laid down by the statute.² The provisions in the statute of a particular method of attaching subrents excluded by implication the ordinary method, and it had been held that the assignee of a security over a long lease could not have recourse to the remedy of poiding the ground.³ The reference in section 20 of the Registration of Leases Act to certain clauses in the Heritable Securities Act, 1847, did not help the pursuer, for in the clauses referred to there was no mention of an action of mails and duties. This action therefore should be dismissed.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—(1) There was no question that the pursuer was validly in possession of this security. This was not a lease for nineteen years, but a lease for seven times tion in security has been granted, or of a term's interest thereof, or of a term's annuity, for six months after such capital sum or term's interest or annuity shall have fallen due, to apply to the Sheriff for a warrant to enter on possession of the lands and heritages leased; and the Sheriff, after intimation to the lessee for the time being, and to the landlord, shall, if he see cause, grant such warrant, which shall be a sufficient title for such creditor or party to enter into possession of such lands and heritages, and to uplift the rents from any subtenants therein, and to sublet the same, as freely and to the like effect as the lessee might have done: Provided always, that no such creditor or party, unless and until he enter into possession as aforesaid, shall be personally liable to the landlord in any of the obligations and prestations of the lease."

Sec. 20. "The several clauses in the Schedules to this Act annexed shall be held to import such and the like meaning, and to have such and the like effect as is declared by the Act of the 10th and 11th of Queen Victoria, chapter 50, sections second and third, to belong to the corresponding clauses in the Schedule to the said recited Act annexed . . ."

The Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 2, enacts:—"The clause of assignation of rents to become due or payable shall be held to import an assignation to rents from and after . . . (a certain term) . . . including therein a power to the creditor, on default in payment, to enter into possession of the lands disposed in security and uplift the rents thereof subject to accounting. . . ."

nineteen years, and as soon as this tenant had entered under the original lease he had a real right for the whole period.¹ The lease here, being renewable for a definite period of years, was distinguishable from cases where the period was indefinite. Further, in case of a lease with an obligation to renew, if the tenant remained in possession after the expiry of the original period, the renewal was implied.² The pursuer's averments clearly inferred the continued subsistence of this lease. The defender's statements also clearly inferred it, for the whole nature of her defences on the merits was based on the supposition that the lease still continued. In any event, if the defender had intended to press this point, it should have been raised in the defences by a clear statement that the lease had not been renewed, and any such statement was carefully avoided here. (2) An action of mails and duties at the instance of a holder of a security over a long lease was competent, being imported into the 1857 Act by the reference in section 20 thereof to the 1847 Act. That reference gave the assignation of rents the same effect that it had under the 1847 Act, and one effect of it under that Act was that it could be enforced by an action of mails and duties.³ The fact that another remedy was, in special circumstances, provided by section 6 of the 1857 Act did not affect the question. Both remedies were given by the statute, and there was no reason why they should not exist concurrently.⁴

At advising on 4th July 1908,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn, in an action in the form of an action of mails and duties, instituted by the assignee (in security) of a tenant under a long lease granted by the Earl of Seafield of subjects in Grantown. The action is directed against subtenants, and concludes against them for payment of their rents to the secured creditor.

The title founded on is a lease or tack, dated 14th August 1866, which narrates that the Earl's predecessors had let to the deceased John Steuart the subjects in question with entry at Whitsunday 1812, and that for the space of nineteen years, with a promise to renew the said tack or lease for a space of other nine nineteen years. On this narrative Lord Seafield lets to James M'Gillivray (then in right of the obligation), and his heirs and assignees, the subjects as therein described, and that for the space of nineteen years from the term of Whitsunday 1850, which was thereby declared to be the commencement of a third nineteen years' lease, with obligation to renew in terms of the original grant.

The condescendence states that this lease was by James M'Gillivray assigned to Marmaduke Gill, through whom the present tenant, Mrs Elizabeth Macdonald or Gill, derives right. The said Marmaduke Gill assigned the leasehold subjects to William Grant in security of a loan of £700, and the pursuer, Miss Dunbar, has acquired the creditor's right in the bond and assignation in security. These facts are undisputed.

The first objection to the action is that the lease, which, as I have said,

But the objection is purely technical, because Lord Seafield is under obligation to renew the lease, and as it does not appear on the face of the record that the lease has not been renewed, the objection is not raised in a form which makes it necessary for a Court of Appeal to dispose of it.

Lord M'Laren.

The next objection is that an action of mails and duties is not a species of diligence which is open to a creditor who has no higher security than an assignation of a leasehold interest.

It has not been, and could not seriously be, disputed, that the right of a heritable creditor to compel the tenants to pay their rents to him when the proprietor is in arrear, is a right which, at common law, is only competent to a creditor who holds a security over a feudal estate. But, on behalf of the pursuer it was maintained that the Act of Parliament which provides for the registration of long leases in the Register of Sasines (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 26) had put creditors holding securities over registered leases in the same position as proper heritable creditors.

The 20th section of this Act provides that the several clauses in the schedules to this Act annexed shall have the same meaning and effect as is declared by the Act 10 and 11 Vict. cap. 50, secs. 2 and 3, to belong to the corresponding clauses in the schedule to the said recited Act, and also that the procedure for a sale at the instance of a heritable creditor shall be applicable to a sale of any such lease assigned in security. I am here giving only the substance of the clause. Now, the first and second schedules to the Long Leases Act, which are the forms for an absolute assignation and an assignation in security respectively, contain the words, "I assign the rents." I do not doubt that this abridged clause is capable of expansion in terms of the Act 10 and 11 Vict. cap. 50, and that it imports an effective assignment of the benefit of the rents in favour of the creditor. It seems to follow (but I do not wish to express an unqualified opinion on a point which is not before us) that if this assignment were properly intimated to the tenants, the bondholder would have a preference in bankruptcy. But I do not find in either of the statutes referred to anything importing a declaration that the diligence known as an action of mails and duties is to be open to a creditor holding a security over a registered lease.

But for section 6 of the Long Leases Act there might be room for the argument that the power of compelling the subtenant to pay to the secured creditor was given by implication. But as in general an express power will exclude an implied power, where the conditions are different, I must hold that the argument is displaced by the 6th section, which gives a remedy to the creditor ejusdem generis with an action of mails and duties, but under different conditions. The substance of the provision is that where there is default of payment of the capital sum or interest for the period of six months, the creditor may apply to the Sheriff for a warrant to enter on possession of the lands and heritages leased, and that the Sheriff, after intimation, shall, if he see cause, grant such warrant, which, as the statute explains, will empower the creditor to uplift rents from subtenants. Now, an action of mails and duties is a proceeding under which the pursuer may obtain, as matter of right, a decree in absence, but this is a very different right from that of obtaining a warrant causa cognita from a Judge. It is impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended that these rights should subsist concurrently, and I therefore come to the conclusion that the pursuer has been wrongly advised as to her remedy, and that her right to the rents payable by subtenants could only be made effectual by means of a special warrant in terms of the 6th section of the statute. The appeal must therefore be sustained, and the action dismissed.

Dunbar v.

Lord M'Laren.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree, and I think that the ground your Lordship has stated is sufficient for the decision of the case. We had a variety of criticisms from the Dean of Faculty on the whole procedure before us which, if it were necessary, would require consideration in detail. I am disposed to think that the greater number of the defects pointed out by the learned Dean are mere apparent anomalies which do not go to the substance of the matter at all, and are perhaps necessarily consequent upon the main provisions of the statute. The purpose of the statute, so far as we are concerned, is to enable the holders of leasehold ground to give a real security to their creditors which may be effectual notwithstanding that there is no immediate change in the natural possession; and in order that that design may be carried out the statute authorises, with reference to leases, proceedings which are more properly applicable to rights of property in land, and uses language which is more appropriate to titles of property than to leases. But then it is just because that is so that I think we must be cautious, in reading particular instruments, against being over critical, in case we should thereby be going against the plain design and purpose of the statute. The main purpose of the statute is in itself simple enough, and the methods prescribed seem to me to rest upon perfectly sound analogies, and I am disposed to think that there is no difficulty in carrying out the purpose of the Act.

But there remain two objections which appear to me to be formidable. The first, upon which I desire to express no decided opinion, and I think your Lordship in the chair has expressed none, is that the pursuer has not established any sound statutory basis for the procedure at all, because she has not disclosed upon the face of her proceedings that she does hold a statutory security over an existing lease recorded in the Register of Sasines. That is the fundamental basis of the whole proceeding, and if it be so, there is an end of the question. I am not satisfied that the answer to this question which was maintained by Mr Dickson is perfectly sound, because it is a fundamental condition of the pursuer's right to an action of this kind that it should be shewn to be based upon the real right which the statute requires in order to support the proceedings at all. The criticisms upon the defender's record may be formidable enough, but an ad hominem argument will not support a diligence in execution against land, and therefore I am not satisfied that the Dean's objection on this point has been met.

But I do not desire to express any final opinion on the subject, which would require an examination of the whole series of instruments, because the other ground upon which your Lordship has proceeded is sufficient. The pursuer's case in support of this proceeding is rested upon the importing of the second section of the Heritable Securities Act, 1847, into the July 4, 1908. Registration of Leases Act, 1857, by the terms of the 20th section of the latter, and the argument is that if these two enactments are read together there is statutory authority for enforcing the right by an action of mails and duties. Now, the second section of the Heritable Securities Act says nothing about an action of mails and duties. The 20th section of the Registration of Leases Act says that the several clauses in the schedules annexed to the Act, which have been followed in the instruments now before us, "are to import such and the like meaning, and to have such and the like effect, as is declared by the Act of 10 and 11 of Queen Victoria, chapter 50, sections 2 and 3," to belong to the corresponding clauses in the schedule to that Act. Now, section 2 of the Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act is the section with which we are concerned, and all that it says, so far as applicable to the present question, is that the clause of assignation of rents shall be held to import an assignation to rents from and after a certain term in the fuller form generally in use, "including therein the power to the creditor, in default in payment, to enter into possession of the lands disposed in security and uplift the rents thereof." Now, if that were the enactment upon which the present pursuer had to proceed, I could see a very sound argument for saying that that must mean an action of mails and duties, because no other process is prescribed for entering into possession, and therefore it might be said that the ordinary procedure known to the law is that which is to be followed. But when we read that provision as part of the Registration of Leases Act, we find that the statute itself provides a special proceeding for entering into possession, because the sixth clause sets out in terms the specific method by which a creditor is to enter upon possession of the lands and heritages and to uplift the rents from any subtenant. I take it to be a general rule of law that when an Act of Parliament creates a new right, and at the same time prescribes a new method of procedure for giving effect to it, anyone who desires to take advantage of the Act must follow strictly the prescribed procedure. The pursuer has not followed the procedure, but has gone outside the terms of the statute, and has adopted a form of procedure which it does not recognise, and therefore I am of opinion with your Lordship that this proceeding falls.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

WILLIAM BELL, Claimant (Appellant).—Morison, K.C.—Jameson.
JOHN GORDON GRAHAM, Respondent.—Johnston, K.C.—Inglis.

Graham.

Lease—Compensation for Improvements—Agreement—Fair and reasonable Compensation—Arbitration—Powers and Duties of Arbitrator—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 5, and Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. 50), secs. 1 and 2 (1).—The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, sec. 5, enacts that where "any particular agreement in writing secures to the tenant" for certain improvements "fair and reasonable compensation, having regard to the June 16, 1908. circumstances existing at the time of making such agreement, then in such case the compensation in respect of such improvement shall be payable in pursuance of the particular agreement and not under this Act." Bell v. Graham.

The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900, sec. 1, enacts that, subject to the above enactment, a tenant shall, on quitting his holding, be entitled as compensation to such sum as represents the value of the improvement to an incoming tenant, and by sec. 2 (1) enacts that when landlord and tenant do not agree as to compensation, the question must be settled by arbitration.

In an arbitration between a landlord and an outgoing tenant as to the amount of compensation for improvements to which the tenant was entitled, the tenant objected to the scale of compensation fixed by the lease at the commencement of his tenancy on the ground that it was not fair and reasonable, and claimed compensation on the scale fixed by the Act of 1883.

Held by a majority of a Court of seven Judges (Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord M'Laren, Lord Kinnear, and Lord Low, diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Ardwall), that the arbiter, in order to explicate his jurisdiction, was bound to decide whether the scale of compensation fixed by the lease was, at its date, fair and reasonable and so fell to be applied.

Observed that the decision of the arbiter on this question would not be final, and might be challenged in a process of interdict or of reduction.

By written offer dated 3d November 1899 William Bell offered to become tenant of the farm of Wyseby Mains in the county of Dumfries, the property of Major-General John Gordon Graham, upon certain conditions prefixed to the offer, which conditions he bound himself to fulfil; and by written acceptance dated 9th November 1899 Major-General Graham accepted this offer. The conditions referred to were in writing, and were enumerated in twenty-two clauses, each of which was separately signed by both landlord and tenant. Clause 16 provided:—"The landlord hereby undertakes to execute all the improvements specified in the first and second parts of the Schedule to Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, on such terms as may from time to time be agreed upon in writing; and the tenant agrees that the landlord shall have the sole right to execute said improvements at such times and whenever the landlord considers them necessary. As to the improvements specified in the third part of the Schedule to Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, it is hereby agreed that the tenant shall be entitled, on quitting his holding at the termination of his tenancy, to obtain from the landlord compensation only in accordance with the following scale." Then followed a long scale (described by Lord Stormonth-Darling, infra, p. 1068) applicable to various classes of improvements of the kinds specified in the third part of the Schedule to the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, and in Part III. of the First Schedule to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900.* 2d Division. with three consulted Judges. Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

At the expiry of the lease the tenant gave notice of a claim for compensation, and instituted arbitration proceedings under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900. The arbiters appointed by the landlord and by the tenant having declined to act, the arbitration devolved upon the oversman, Mr Robert Francis Dudgeon, of Cargen, who had been appointed by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries.

William Bell, the tenant, maintained that the compensation pro-

June 16, 1908. vided by the agreement contained in clause 16 of the provisions prefixed to the offer and acceptance above mentioned was unfair and unreasonable, and that the said agreement was therefore void, and ought to be ignored by the oversman, and that the oversman should award compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883.

Bell v. Graham.

The landlord, on the other hand, contended that the said agreement provided compensation such as was, by said Act, permitted to be substituted for the compensation thereunder, and that the oversman should give effect to it in his award; and further, that the oversman was not entitled, at his own hand, to set aside or ignore said agreement, but must give effect to it.

The oversman had difficulty in deciding between these two contentions, and in particular as to whether he had the power or right to consider the tenant's contention that he should ignore said agreement as being void, in respect it was unfair and unreasonable.

He therefore, in terms of section 2 (6) and section 9 of Part I. of the Second Schedule to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900, stated a case for the opinion of the Sheriff upon the following question of law:—"Whether the oversman is entitled to set aside or ignore as void the agreement contained in said lease providing compensation to the tenant for improvements on the scale and as therein specified, in lieu of compensation under the third part of the Schedule to the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, if in his opinion 'fair and reasonable' compensation is not thereby substituted for the compensation exigible under said Act, or must the oversman give effect to this agreement and scale of compensation unless or until the same is set aside or reduced by a competent Court?"

On 6th December 1907 the Sheriff (Fleming) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, in answer to the question put, that the oversman must give effect to the agreement and scale of compensation therein mentioned unless and until the same is set aside or reduced by a Court of law."*

* "NOTE.—The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act gives to a tenant farmer compensation for improvements. The value of this right is, if possible, to be ascertained by agreement between the landlord and tenant. This agreement may be entered into not only at the termination of the lease after the claim for compensation is lodged, but also at any earlier stage even in the lease itself. It may be complete in that it contains all the factors for ascertaining the money value of the compensation, or partial, containing only certain of such factors.

"When the parties have not been able to come to any agreement either before or after the termination of the lease, or when the agreement is only partial, the Acts provide for the ascertainment of the value of the compensation by a statutory reference. What the reference includes is the ascertainment of the said value, with or without any factors that may have been agreed upon. But the Acts provide that the agreement, if entered into in anticipation of the claim, shall only be held as substituting the particular factors agreed upon for these which the parties themselves or the referee may adopt if they will result in 'fair and reasonable compensation, having regard to the circumstances existing at the time of making such agreement.'

"It may be that such an agreement is challenged by one or other of the parties, but that challenge does not extend the limits of the reference. The factors to be used by the referee are agreed upon, and until that agreement is set aside the referee has no option but to use them.

"I was asked to interpret the Acts by what, it was argued, was their obvious

William Bell, the tenant, appealed to the Court of Session. The case was heard before the Second Division on 28th January 1908, and was taken to avizandum. Thereafter on 25th February 1908 the case was appointed to be heard before the Second Division with three Judges of the First Division. The hearing before the seven Judges took place on 10th March 1908.

Bell v.
Graham.

Argued for the appellant;—There had to be an arbitration under the Act here in any case, whether compensation was to be awarded in accordance with the agreement or in accordance with the Acts.¹ The arbiter could not proceed in the arbitration without deciding the question whether the agreement was fair and reasonable. Where a jurisdiction was conferred by statute, all powers necessary to give effect to it were implied. Section 20 (2) of the Act of 1883, which, although repealed by the Act of 1900, might still be referred to for purposes of interpretation, also shewed that the question of fairness and reasonableness was one for the arbiter's decision. It was not enough that there was an agreement in existence. There was a sharp contrast between the question arising under sections 3 or 4, or the first paragraph of section 5 of the Act of 1883, and the question arising under the second paragraph of section 5. In the former cases the only question was as to the existence of the consent, notice, or agreement. In the latter there was a question as to the quality as well as the existence of the agreement. Before the arbiter could proceed to award compensation under such an agreement he must be satisfied that it was fair and reasonable. Unless the agreement provided fair and reasonable compensation it was void. The arbiter was therefore bound to consider the terms of the agreement, and was only entitled to give effect to it in so far as it provided fair and reasonable compensation. It made no difference whether the agreement was formal or informal. If the arbiter decided wrongly on the question as to the fairness and reasonableness of the compensation provided by the agreement, his decision was subject to review. Such a decision was a decision on a question of mixed fact and law, and upon any question of law or mixed fact and law there was a right of appeal.

Argued for the respondent;—The arbiter had no jurisdiction to determine the question whether an agreement provided "fair and reasonable compensation." All that he was given jurisdiction to determine was the amount, time, and mode of payment of the compensation, failing agreement upon these points between landlord and tenant. He was really only a valuer. He was quite unfitted to decide a question such as the present, involving proof and questions intention, viz. : that the tenant should be free from any obligation which he had undertaken unless it was approved of by the referee. I cannot do so. In the first place, it seems to me that a much more obvious intention of the Acts is to retain the binding effect on obligations solemnly entered into, unless there are substantial grounds for setting them aside. In the second place, I am not prepared by presuming the intention of an Act to hold that it has altered the law of the land. If the Legislature wished to make the referee under these Acts the judge of the validity of the agreement as to what was to be referred, and thus the judge of the extent of his own jurisdiction, it could easily have said so, but it has not."

of law, and there was no case in which he had been held entitled to do so. No jurisdiction to sit in judgment upon the contract of parties could be reasonably inferred by implication from a power to determine a question of amount of compensation. If an agreement as to compensation was tabled, the arbiter must give effect to it. The presumption was that an agreement concluded by two rational men was fair and reasonable. That presumption could only be rebutted by a decree of reduction or declarator. If the agreement was challenged by either party on the ground that it did not provide fair and reasonable compensation, then the proper course for the arbiter was to sist the arbitration until that question had been determined by a competent Court. Except in so far as expressly superseded by the Acts, the common law of the land must still receive effect, and the jurisdiction of the arbiter could not be held by implication or upon ambiguous expressions to be extended so as to oust the common law.¹ It was for a Court to say whether the freedom of contract, which the Acts left to parties, had or had not been validly exercised.²

The LORD PRESIDENT referred to Newby v. Eckersley.³

At advising on 16th June 1908,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts)—The question is one of considerable practical importance in the working of the Act, and as I am aware that there is a difference of opinion among your Lordships, I do not wonder at finding that it is not of easy solution. Nevertheless, the solution must depend on the terms of the statute, and the question of what consequences will follow is not, I think, one for which this tribunal is responsible.

I think it will conduce to clearness if I, for the moment, leave on one side the judgment of the learned Sheriff and approach the matter from the outset.

The Act of 1900 partly repeals and partly embodies the earlier Act of 1883. We must, therefore, read the Act of 1900 with the unrepealed clauses of the Act of 1883 written into it.

The right to compensation is given by the 1st section of the Act of 1900—"Where a tenant has made on his holding any improvement comprised in the First Schedule to this Act, he shall, subject as in the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883 (in this Act referred to as the principal Act)"—this is by the application clause to be read for Scotland as Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883—"and in this Act mentioned, be entitled, at the determination of a tenancy, on quitting his holding, to obtain from the landlord as compensation under the said Acts for the improvement such sum as fairly represents the value of the improvement to an incoming tenant," and then follows a proviso which does not apply to the present case. That is the charter of the tenant.

Logically, the section that next follows is the 36th of the Act of 1883—"Any contract or agreement made by a tenant by virtue of which he is deprived of his right to claim compensation under this Act in respect of any improvement specified in the schedule hereto (except an agreement providing such compensation as is by this Act permitted to be substituted for June 16, 1908. compensation under this Act), shall, so far as it deprives him of such right, ^{Bell v.} be void." That maintains the charter of the tenant. ^{Graham.}

I now assume that the tenant has made an improvement mentioned in the Schedule. The question of the position of agreements as to improvements outside the Schedule, to which some of the cases cited referred, is a different one, and really does not touch the present question. ^{Ld. President.}

What, then, is the tenant to do? That is fixed by section 2 (1) of the Act of 1900—"If a tenant claims to be entitled to compensation, whether under the principal Act or this Act, or under custom, agreement, or otherwise, in respect of any improvement comprised in the First Schedule to this Act, and if the landlord and tenant fail to agree as to the amount and time and mode of payment of such compensation, the difference shall be settled by arbitration in accordance with the provisions, if any, in that behalf in any agreement between landlord and tenant; and in default of and subject to any such provisions, by arbitration under this Act in accordance with the provisions set out in the Second Schedule to this Act."

Now, reverting to section 1, it will be remembered that the right to compensation is "subject to the principal Act." That lets in as one of the conditions the unrepealed section 5, and the bit of section 5 which applies to the matter in hand is the second paragraph, which is as follows:—"Where, in the case of a tenancy under a lease beginning after the commencement of this Act, any particular agreement in writing secures to the tenant for any improvement specified in the third part of the schedule hereto, and executed after the commencement of this Act, fair and reasonable compensation, having regard to the circumstances existing at the time of making such agreement, then in such case the compensation in respect of such improvement shall be payable in pursuance of the particular agreement and not under this Act."

Taking, now, the phrase in section 2, "whether under the principal Act or this Act, or under custom or agreement or otherwise," I come to the clear conclusion that the result is that in default of provision in the agreement itself for arbitration (which is the case here) there must be an arbitration under the Act to determine the compensation. I emphasise this because I understand that at least one of your Lordships is of opinion that the true operation of an agreement such as we have here is to take the matter out of the arbitration clauses altogether, leaving the tenant to recover by an action at common law, founding upon an arithmetical calculation of the sums due and reckoned in accordance with the factors set forth in the agreed-on scale calculated according to averred facts of expenditure. I do not hold that view, but I remark, in passing, that if it were right, the question would not fall to be answered as the Sheriff has done, and, indeed, could not, in the terms put, be answered at all.

There being then (to revert to my own opinion) an arbitration, what is the arbiter to do? He has presented to him an agreement which substitutes an agreed-on scale of compensation for the scale which, so to speak, resides in his own breast and which he would apply in an ordinary case. Such substitution is not against the terms of the Act. It is expressly recognised and legalised by the terms of section 36: "An agreement providing such June 16, 1908. compensation as is by this Act permitted to be substituted for compensation under this Act."

Bell v.

Graham.

Ld. President.

But it is not every substituted scale which is "permitted." It is only one in terms of, inter alia, section 5, and that is not absolute, it is conditional; conditional on being "fair and reasonable, having regard to the circumstances at the time of making" the agreement.

Now, I will revert in a little to an examination of what is the true meaning of this condition, but for the moment I pursue the duty of the arbiter. He has got to go on with the arbitration. He has tabled to him an agreed-on scale. He is told by the statute that he is to take that scale and not any notions of his own, but only if that scale is fair and reasonable, having regard to the circumstances existing at the making of the agreement. The agreement is challenged by one of the parties as not fulfilling these conditions. I ask how is it possible that the arbiter should not be obliged to make up his own mind on the subject in order to see what he is to do next?

The learned Sheriff says no. There is the agreement. It gives the factors of computation, and the arbiter must take those, and not those of his choice, unless and until the agreement is put out of existence by appropriate process of law. That reasoning seems to me simply to cut out of the section of the Act of Parliament all the words (if I may coin an expression) of conditionality. It might well have been so. One might well think that if parties of full age set their minds to an agreement, that that might be allowed to stand. But that is not what the Act says. It does not say "If an agreement duly signed"; it says, "If an agreement which secures fair and reasonable compensation having regard to," &c.

Accordingly, I reluctantly am compelled to differ from the Sheriff, and to hold that the arbiter, if a tabled agreement is challenged, must proceed to determine the question whether such agreement is, as the 36th section phrases it, a "permissible" agreement, in order to explicate his own jurisdiction to give or not to give compensation under the Act according to a scale deemed right by himself.

But now I hasten to say that the opposing contention, which seems, from the learned Sheriff's note, to have been pressed upon him as the proper alternative to his judgment, and which he repelled, is, in my opinion, entirely wrong and fallacious. The learned Sheriff says: "I was asked to interpret the Acts by what, it was argued, was their obvious intention, viz., that the tenant should be free from any obligation which he had undertaken unless it was approved of by the referee. I cannot do so," and then he gives his reasons.

Perhaps it was the horror against such an obviously unjust result which was partly the reason which led the Sheriff to his judgment. But in my view not only is the contention that the tenant should be freed from any obligation which he has undertaken unless it is approved of by the referee wrong, but it is fallacious, because it does not present itself as a necessary alternative.

Let me now revert to the true meaning of the condition. It really is quite plain, and it is difficult to find words to make it plainer than the words used. The criterion of fairness is not what the arbiter would apply as his scale now, or what anyone else would apply now, but it is, Was it fair when entered into? i.e., in view of what was known and expected June 16, 1908. then; not what has happened since. But I go farther. If parties of full age sign an agreement the presumption of fact is very strong that it is fair and reasonable. Take the agreement in the present case with its careful wording and its signature to each clause. If ever agreement bore upon the face of it the marks of careful consideration, this one does. And the matter was one in which the tenant was probably more rather than less of an expert than the landlord. In such a case not only is the presumption of fact in favour of the agreement being fair and reasonable one of enormous strength—I do not hesitate to use the epithet—but I have no hesitation in saying that an averment in mere general terms that it is not fair and reasonable is an irrelevant averment, because wanting in specification. In other words, I say that the arbiter here would be wrong in considering the challenge of the agreement at all unless the tenant should particularise on the exact points in which the agreement was not fair and reasonable, and should condescend upon the reasons for so holding. I trust that arbiters who hereafter may be appointed in such cases will bear these words—which I hope I have expressed so clearly as not to admit of misunderstanding—steadily in mind; for if they do not, and merely—to use what I consider the unhappy phrase used here in the question—“ignore” the agreement, because its scale is not the same as their scale, they will not be doing their duty.

Bell v. Graham.
 Ld. President.

I will add a further word which may, perhaps, if what I have said is not sufficient, induce caution.

It is a clear corollary from my judgment so far—in the result of which I am aware the majority of your Lordships concur—that though the arbiter must, as I have said, decide this question upon the agreement if challenged—yet his judgment will not be final. If he holds the agreement not fair and reasonable he will then proceed to award compensation according to his own scale. But to do so, if the agreement is really fair and reasonable, is to do something ultra vires, because the statute says that the agreement compensation is to be substituted for the ordinary compensation. Nothing, therefore, short of a positive enactment that on the point of the reasonableness of the agreement the arbiter's judgment was to be final,—and no such enactment is to be found,—could save his proceeding from the ordinary fate of a proceeding ultra vires. In other words, I am clear that if an arbiter treats as void a signed agreement as being not fair and reasonable, he may be interdicted from proceeding further, so that a Court of law may forthwith determine whether the agreement is fair and reasonable in regard to the circumstances under which it was entered into or not.

The question was mooted as to whether this point could not be raised by appeal on case stated. I think not; such appeal seems to me to be given on points arising within the jurisdiction, not for determining the limits of the jurisdiction. Further, I do not see how it could be conveniently tried in a form of process which does not allow the reviewing Court to have an inquiry into facts, for the “having regard to circumstances existing,” &c., necessitates an inquiry into fact, and the question on the merits is one in which fact and law are, in my opinion, inextricably involved. But even if it could be raised, I do not think that, viewing the question as I do as being

Bell v.
Graham.

Ld. President.

The result on the whole is that I think we should answer the question, but not exactly in the terms put, which, as I have indicated, are, I think, badly chosen, and apt to be misleading, and that we should say:—

That the arbiter, if the agreement tabled is challenged by the tenant as not being fair and reasonable under the circumstances existing at the time of making such agreement, is bound to decide that question for himself in order to determine his further procedure, but that he must bear in mind, first, that the criterion is the fairness and reasonableness of the agreement as viewed in the light of the circumstances at the time of making, and not the question as to whether it does or does not tally with the scale which the arbiter if left to himself would now apply; and second, that the agreement being signed by both parties, it is necessary for the party seeking to hold it not fair and reasonable to condescend specifically on the provisions objected to and the reasons for holding these provisions not fair and reasonable.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—Major-General Graham of Moesknow is the landlord, and William Bell is the outgoing tenant of the farm of Wyseby Mains in Dumfriesshire. The lease of the farm by clause 16 contains an agreement entitling the tenant, “on quitting his holding at the termination of his tenancy, to obtain from the landlord compensation only in accordance with the following scale,” and then follows a scale defining for the last few years of the lease certain allowances for lime and bones and artificial manures and feeding stuffs, coupled with an obligation on the part of the tenant, whenever required by the landlord or his agent, to give a detailed account of the quality and quantity of the manures and feeding stuffs, and a corresponding right on the part of the landlord or his agent to take samples of such manures or feeding stuffs and to get them analysed. All this is described as “agreed to and signed” by both landlord and tenant.

The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, provides by section 5 that “where in the case of a tenancy under a lease beginning after the commencement of this Act, any particular agreement in writing secures to the tenant for any improvement specified in the third part of the schedule hereto, and executed after the commencement of this Act, fair and reasonable compensation, having regard to the circumstances existing at the time of making such agreement, then in such case the compensation in respect of such improvement shall be payable in pursuance of the particular agreement, and not under this Act.”

The unrepealed portion of section 16 of the Act of 1883 must be read along with section 5. It provides that “in any case provided for by sections 3, 4, or 5, if compensation is claimed under this Act, such compensation as under any of those sections is to be deemed to be substituted for compensation under this Act, if and in so far as the same can, consistently with the terms of the agreement, if any, be ascertained by the referees or the oversman, shall be awarded in respect of any improvements thereby provided for.” The important words which are thus left standing are “if and in so far as the same can, consistently with the terms of the agreement, if any, be ascertained by the referees or the oversman”; and the question arises whether the determination of fairness and reasonableness of the June 16, 1908. agreed-on compensation can, consistently with the terms of the agreement, Bell v. be left to the referees or the oversman, or whether the mere fact of the Graham. compensation having been agreed on excludes all inquiry into the fairness and reasonableness of the compensation. Ld Stormonth-Darling.

The only other section of the Act of 1883 requiring to be noticed is the 36th section, which provides that "any contract or agreement made by a tenant by virtue of which he is deprived of his right to claim compensation under this Act in respect of any improvement specified in the schedule hereto (except an agreement providing such compensation as is by this Act permitted to be substituted for compensation under this Act) shall, so far as it deprives him of such right, be void." But it is not maintained that this lease contains any contract or agreement which deprives the tenant of his right to claim compensation under the Act, so the 36th section does not seem to have any application to this case.

An arbitration was instituted under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Acts, 1883 to 1900, for the purpose of settling certain differences which had arisen between the landlord, General Graham, and the outgoing tenant, Mr William Bell, and the arbiters appointed by the landlord and tenant having declined to act, Mr Dudgeon of Cargen was appointed by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries to be oversman in the reference, and the arbitration devolved upon him.

In the course of the arbitration Mr Dudgeon stated this case for the opinion of the Sheriff on a question of law, and the question of law which he stated is appended to the case. The oversman, after setting out the opposing contentions of parties, stated that he had difficulty in deciding between these two contentions, and practically referred the question to the Sheriff without indicating any opinion of his own. The Sheriff, Mr Fleming, found, "in answer to the question put by the oversman that the oversman must give effect to the agreement and scale of compensation therein mentioned, unless and until the same is set aside or reduced by a Court of law." The tenant has now appealed to this Court under the 6th subsection of section 2 of the Act of 1900.

The question which we have to decide—and which must, equally with the question put to the Sheriff, be a question of law—is whether the Sheriff was right or wrong in the answer he gave.

There is perhaps not much practical difference between the opinion expressed by the majority of your Lordships and the learned Sheriff, for I do not understand that your Lordships, any more than the Sheriff, give any countenance to the notion that the opinion of the oversman can be a final opinion, or indeed any opinion at all, on a question of law. That must always be, in the end, a question for a Court of law. The oversman may have to apply the scale of compensation to the facts as he finds them, and work out the figures accordingly. The only relevant ground on which he could find that the compensation "secured" by the agreement was not fair and reasonable would be by holding that it was illusory and therefore void under the 36th section of the Act of 1883. But that, as I have said, is not alleged with regard to this agreement; and therefore I do not see what there is to prevent our getting at once to the real question of law, and

June 16, 1908. answering it as the Sheriff has done ; that is, by telling the oversman that he must give effect to the agreement and scale of compensation therein mentioned, unless and until the same is set aside by a Court of law.

Bell v.
Graham.

LdStormonth-Darling. When the landlord or tenant, as the case may be, has once put his hand to an agreement bearing, in all its several particulars (including the scale of compensation) that it had been "agreed to and signed" by both landlord and tenant, what did or could that mean but that each of them, being sciens et prudens, and taking all the terms on either side into consideration, thought the particular stipulation a fair and reasonable one to make as between man and man ? It is the first and most cardinal rule of all written contracts. And it clearly implies, not that somebody else thinks it fair and reasonable in itself, but that the party to the contract himself is satisfied with it as being fair and reasonable. If he is not so satisfied is there any rule more firmly established than this, that the party to a contract who proposes to repudiate it must be prepared to allege some reason for his repudiation, which will be judged of by the ordinary laws of relevancy ? That would have to be done if the tenant in the case raised the action which the Sheriff invites. Here the only introduction of the element of fairness and reasonableness of the proposed compensation is to be found in the statute itself, and the statute nowhere declares, or even indicates, that the judge of the fairness and reasonableness is to be the arbiters or oversman. Indeed, every indication in the statute is that agreement between landlord and tenant is favoured wherever it can be reached ; and it is only where the determination of fairness and reasonableness can be left to the referees or the oversman, consistently with the terms of the agreement, that they are invoked at all. In my view it is not consistent with the terms of the agreement that they should be so invoked. Moreover, I do not see how the question of law which, everybody admits, must be decided in the end, could be raised better or more sharply than it is in this case. So far as raised on the present averments of the tenant, these are plainly irrelevant for want of specification.

I should therefore be for refusing the appeal, and answering the question substantially as the Sheriff has answered it.

LORD LOW.—The Agricultural Holdings Acts provide that a tenant at the determination of a tenancy, on quitting his holding shall, subject to certain conditions, obtain from the landlord, as compensation for the improvements specified in the first schedule, such sum as fairly represents the value of the improvements to an incoming tenant.

The third part of the schedule comprises improvements in respect of which consent of, or notice to, the landlord is not required, and it is with such improvements only that the present case is concerned.

It is provided by the second section of the Act of 1900, which your Lordship has read, that if the landlord and tenant fail to agree in regard to the amount and time and mode of payment of compensation, the difference shall be settled by arbitration. Accordingly, in regard to all of these matters, the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts is excluded ; and if the parties cannot agree, the only way in which their difference can be settled is by arbitration.

In this case there is an agreement between the landlord and the tenant ^{June 16, 1908.} (of a kind which I believe to be very common), fixing the scale upon which compensation for certain improvements of the kind enumerated in the third ^{Bell v. Graham.} part of the schedule is to be calculated. Of course, under such an agree- ^{Lord Low.} ment, the amount of money to be paid to the tenant as compensation depends upon the quantity of lime or other substance which has been applied to the land, and the time at which it has been so applied. If the parties cannot agree upon these points, and therefore cannot arrive at the amount of compensation to be paid, it is necessary for them to go to arbitration. That is what happened in this case; and if the only question had been the ascertainment of the amount of the compensation, by applying the agreed-on scale to such quantities of fertilising material as might be found to have been put into the land, the duty of the arbiter and the procedure to be adopted by him would have been clear enough.

The tenant, however, founding upon the fifth section of the Act of 1883, maintains that the agreement does not secure to him "fair and reasonable compensation, having regard to the circumstances existing at the time of making such agreement," and, accordingly, he asks the arbiter to settle the amount of compensation to be paid to him, not in accordance with the agreement, but according to the rule which the statute enacts for cases in which there is no agreement. The statute makes no express provision as to the tribunal which is to determine whether or not an agreement is fair and reasonable, and accordingly the question arises whether it is the duty and within the province of the arbiter to consider and dispose of the tenant's objection, or whether he is bound to give effect to the agreement unless and until it is set aside or reduced by a competent Court?

In the ordinary case, the first thing which an arbiter has to do is to ascertain what is the extent of the jurisdiction committed to him, or, in other words, what precisely is the question which he has to determine. In this case that depends upon whether or not the agreement is one to which the arbiter is bound to give effect. If the agreement is to rule, his jurisdiction is confined to ascertaining the quantities of lime and the like, put into the land, and, by applying thereto the agreed-on scale, arriving at the amount of compensation to be paid; while, on the other hand, if the agreement is not to rule, his jurisdiction is to fix the compensation due under the Act—that is to say, the fair value of the improvements to an incoming tenant. Therefore, until the tenant's objection to the agreement is disposed of, the arbiter cannot tell what is the precise extent of his jurisdiction.

Now, it is a well-established rule that a Judge has an implied power to do what is necessary to explicate his jurisdiction, and can therefore determine incidentally any question which is necessary for that purpose, even although that question be one which is not in itself within his jurisdiction.

It therefore seems to me that it is presumably in the power, and therefore the duty of the arbiter in this case, for the purpose of explicating his jurisdiction, to deal with the tenant's objection, and I am unable to find anything in the statutes which, either expressly or by implication, deprives him of that power.

June 16, 1908. It is said, however, that if the arbiter can deal with the question at all, his decision must be final, because the only review of an arbiter's decision which the statutes allow is upon a question of law to be formulated in a stated case; and the question whether an agreement is fair and reasonable could not be made the subject of a stated case, because it is a question of fact.

Bell v.
Graham.

Lord Low.

I entirely dissent from the view that the question is only one of fact. It is a question of mixed fact and law—a question of the inference in regard to the rights and obligations of parties which may legitimately be deduced from certain facts. I am therefore of opinion that the contention that the decision of the arbiter upon the question could not be made the subject of a stated case, because there is no question of law to be stated, is untenable. In the next place, although it is true that the only procedure in the nature of an appeal against the decision of an arbiter in performing his statutory duties, is by way of stated case upon a question of law, I cannot read the statutes as depriving a party to a statutory arbitration of the remedies which the law allows to a party to an arbitration in the event of the arbiter having exceeded or mistaken his jurisdiction.

The question, however, suggests itself (and a very important question it is), whether the provisions of the statute in regard to a stated case are applicable to the decision of an arbiter in regard to the fairness and reasonableness of an agreement? If that question were answered in the affirmative, a somewhat anomalous state of matters would result, if I am right in thinking that the common law remedies of a party to an arbitration are not excluded. If the procedure were by way of stated case the facts would be supplied by the arbiter, and the only question left to the Court would be what was the sound legal inference to be deduced from these facts; while, if the procedure were by way of suspension and interdict or reduction, the ascertainment of the facts, as well as the determination of the legal inference, would be for the Court. Again, if the question were raised by stated case, the decision of this Court would be final, whereas a suspension and interdict or a reduction could be carried to the House of Lords. That would be a somewhat unfortunate state of matters, although, of course, if it be the result of a sound construction of the statutes, the Court cannot give effect to considerations of convenience. Such considerations may, however, legitimately be taken into account when the question arises, what is the sound construction of the statutes?

My first impression was that a stated case was a competent mode of bringing under review the decision of an arbiter upon the question of the fairness of an agreement, and I confess that I was largely influenced by the apparent analogy furnished by the Workmen's Compensation Act, under which the question whether an accident was due to the serious and wilful misconduct of a workman has been held to be a question of law. Upon consideration, however, I have come to the conclusion that the analogy is by no means complete. In the first place, the question of serious and wilful misconduct falls within the jurisdiction of an arbiter under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and is not, like the question of the fairness of an agreement under the Agricultural Holdings Acts, one with which the arbiter has no power to deal except incidentally and for the purpose of explicating his own jurisdiction. In the next place, it seems to me that June 16, 1906. there is, or is likely to be, a material difference in the nature of the facts and circumstances which require to be ascertained in the one case and in the other. The facts upon which the question of serious and wilful misconduct depends are, I should think, in the general case pure questions of fact. All that requires to be ascertained is what was the nature of the accident, and how it happened. The question of the fairness of an agreement, on the other hand, is to be determined upon a consideration of the circumstances existing at the time of making the agreement; and I imagine that nice questions would be likely to arise as to what circumstances were relevant to the issue, or what circumstances could competently be taken into consideration. It therefore seems to me that, from the outset, fact and law would be likely to be (as your Lordship has put it) inextricably involved. I think that the typical case which the Legislature had in view in providing that questions of law might be raised by a stated case was a case where, upon the one hand, there were matters of fact only, and upon the other hand, a question of law only. No doubt an absolutely pure case of that sort may seldom arise, and it may be a matter of difficulty to determine in a particular case whether there can be a sufficiently clear separation of the question of law from the matters of fact to bring the case within the scope of such an enactment. In the present case, however, I have come to the conclusion, although not without hesitation, that facts and law would be likely to be so immixed that no Court could safely decide whether or not the agreement was fair and reasonable within the meaning of the statutes unless it had control of the whole proceedings in which that question fell to be determined.

I therefore agree with the result arrived at by your Lordship in the chair; and perhaps I may be permitted to emphasise my concurrence with the remarks which have fallen from your Lordship in regard to the duty of the arbiter in dealing with the question whether the agreement is or is not fair and reasonable.

LORD ARDWALL—This case raises a question of general importance and, I venture to think, of considerable difficulty.

The question for decision has arisen in the course of an arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Acts, 1883 and 1900, between William Bell, lately tenant of the farm of Wyseby Mains, Dumfriesshire, and Major-General John Gordon Graham of Mossknow, landlord of the said farm. The tenant (the appellant) contended before the oversman that an agreement regarding the compensation which he was to receive for certain improvements specified in the third part of the schedule of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, did not secure to him fair and reasonable compensation for such improvements, and he accordingly desired the oversman to disregard it altogether, and to fix the compensation due to him without reference to it. It may be here noted that the agreement which is made by the lease is a carefully drawn one, and was entered into so recently as November 1899. The landlord, on the other hand, contended that the oversman was not entitled at his own hand to set aside or disregard said agreement, but was bound to give effect to it, unless and June 16, 1908. until it was declared not to be fair and reasonable by a Court of law. The Bell v. oversman, having difficulty in deciding between these two contentions, and Graham. in particular whether he was entitled to disregard the agreement as being Lord Ardwall. unfair and unreasonable without any legal process, stated the present question of law for the opinion of the Sheriff.

The Sheriff has found in answer to the question that the oversman must give effect to the agreement and scale of compensation therein mentioned unless and until the same is set aside or reduced by a Court of law. But as a summons of reduction seems to be inappropriate if not incompetent, the case may be taken as if the Sheriff had decided that a decree in an action of declarator or other competent legal process was needed in order to entitle the oversman to disregard the agreement.

The statutory provision which applies to this case is to be found in the second paragraph of the 5th section of the Act of 1883, which is in these terms :—"Where, in the case of a tenancy under a lease beginning after the commencement of this Act, any particular agreement in writing secures to the tenant for any improvement specified in the third part of the schedule hereto, and executed after the commencement of this Act, fair and reasonable compensation, having regard to the circumstances existing at the time of making such agreement, then in such case the compensation in respect of such improvement shall be payable in pursuance of the particular agreement and not under this Act."

Along with this may be read section 36, which provides as follows :—"Any contract or agreement made by a tenant by virtue of which he is deprived of his right to claim compensation under this Act in respect of any improvement specified in the schedule hereto (except an agreement providing such compensation as is by this Act permitted to be substituted for compensation under this Act), shall, so far as it deprives him of such right, be void."

The Act of 1883 was introduced with a view to securing that tenants in every case should receive fair and reasonable compensation for improvements so far as these benefited the incoming tenant or landlord. With this view it introduced certain arbitration procedure with a view to the expeditious and economical determination of such matters. But at the same time it did not abolish, and was not intended to abolish, agreements for the settlement of compensation, especially for manorial improvements, which agreements were in vogue before the passing of the Act, and had proved useful in practice, and since the passing of the Act I believe it to be the fact that such agreements regulating the scale on which improvement outlay in the way of application of manures to land and the consumption of feeding stuffs not grown on the farm are to be compensated, are exceedingly common and in some parts of the country almost universal; and I see that in a recent legal work, Green's "Encyclopædia of Scots Law," in a form of a lease there is appended thereto what are supposed to be model forms for regulating such compensation, and similar schedules and tables of compensation in use upon various large estates throughout Scotland are to be found in Sheriff Johnston's edition of the "Agricultural Holdings Act." It may therefore be taken that such agreements and accompanying scales of compensation are carefully considered by the parties to them before being entered into. The object of entering into them is manifest. An agreement ^{June 16, 1908.} allows the tenant to know how much compensation he may expect to get ^{Bell v. .} for improvements of the nature specified, and it allows the landlord to know ^{Graham.} what compensation he will require to pay; and I need hardly point out ^{Lord Ardwall.} that a scale of compensation arrived at between parties who are presumably on good terms with each other and in cool blood is likely to be much more just than a scale of compensation fixed by arbiters or overseamen who may possibly be swayed to partial judgments by sentiments or considerations which may arise at the time of a tenant leaving a farm and which ought to have nothing to do with the matter. Indeed, if the parties are reasonable, such agreements might enable them in numerous cases to dispense altogether with the expense and trouble of an arbitration, or in any view to restrict the scope of arbitrations.

Accordingly under the Act there are two methods for ascertaining compensation for any particular improvement or class of improvements; first, the arbitration under the Act; and second, agreement of the parties. But in order that a tenant should not be deprived of his compensation under the Act either by an agreement surrendering his rights altogether or by an illusory agreement, section 36 was enacted, and the clause was inserted in section 5 providing for compensation being payable according to the agreement only if the compensation so provided is fair and reasonable.

The only clause where the two methods of ascertaining compensation are brought together in the Act of 1883 is in section 16, and that section provides: "In any case provided for by sections 3, 4, or 5, if compensation is claimed under this Act, such compensation as under any of these sections is to be deemed to be substituted for compensation under this Act, if and so far as the same can, consistently with the terms of the agreement, if any, be ascertained by the referees or the oversman, shall be awarded in respect of any improvements thereby provided for; and the award shall, when necessary, distinguish such improvements and the amount awarded in respect thereof, and an award given under this section shall be subject to the appeal provided by this Act."

But from this I think it appears that the compensation is only to enter the referees' or oversman's award "if and so far as the same can consistently with the terms of the agreement, if any, be ascertained by the referees or the oversman." Accordingly, even in this section the validity and effective force of an agreement is maintained. But excepting this section there seems to be nothing in the Act to suggest that the arbiters or oversman are to be the judges of the validity of an agreement under the Act, except in so far as it may be said that when an agreement regarding certain improvements is tabled in a reference they must decide whether they are to give effect to the agreement or not.

The question that thus arises is one, I think, very much of onus. On the one hand, it is said that as the statute gives the tenant a right to compensation, he can only be deprived of that by the landlord producing an agreement by which fair and reasonable compensation is secured, and that if the arbitration tribunal do not think that the agreement so tabled to them does secure such compensation, they are bound to proceed to value the improvements themselves, and that it follows that they should, at all events

June 16, 1908. in the first place, be the judges of whether the agreement is fair and reasonable. On the other hand, it is said that unless an agreement is obviously void under the 36th section of the Act, or clearly inapplicable under section 5 of the Act, as not securing fair and reasonable compensation, it must be presumed that an agreement fixing a scale of compensation is fair and reasonable, otherwise the parties would not have entered into it, and that at all events it must be presumed to be fair and reasonable until the reverse is declared by a Court of law.

Bell v.
Graham.

Lord Ardwall.

I am of opinion that the latter contention is the right one. In interpreting statutes they must always be read, so far as possible, consistently with the rules of the common law unless these are expressly excluded. In the statute presently under consideration I do not think these rules are excluded, and accordingly an agreement deliberately entered into by persons under no legal or mental incapacity must be regarded as binding until it is set aside in some competent proceeding. To hold anything else I think would be practically to put a premium on dishonesty, and I am unwilling to believe that the statute intended to do this. But I may mention that it has come under my personal observation, as formerly Sheriff of Perthshire and otherwise, that there is an idea abroad that the statute did intend to do this, and that a tenant may sign any agreement he pleases, believing at the time he signs it that it is not fair and reasonable, and not intending to be bound by it, because he supposes that the Act puts it in the power of arbiters at the termination of the tenancy to say whether the compensation is in their view fair and reasonable or not, and that therefore it does not matter what agreement he signs, because in the long run everything must be determined by the arbiters or oversman. I think it would be very undesirable to give any countenance to this view of the Act; and if it be decided in this case that the question whether an agreement is fair and reasonable rests with the arbiters and the oversman, I fear that such a view will be countenanced. I fear also that such an interpretation will practically make agreements quite valueless and thus lead to their disuse altogether, and this certainly was not the intention of the Act, which very properly recognises and to a certain extent encourages them.

It is, however, I understand, suggested by the majority of your Lordships that the arbiters or oversman are inferentially constituted judges of the validity of an agreement in the sense of the Act, because in order to explicate their own jurisdiction it is necessary for them to decide whether or not any particular agreement is to be given effect to, and then if they decide wrongly, that their decision may be upset as illegal. I will say no more on this last point than that I think it open to doubt whether such remedy will be available when the arbiters have once decided the compensation payable in any case. In any view, however, I hold it more consistent with ordinary law and practice that the arbiters (except where an agreement is ex facie absolutely unjust or illusory) should hold it binding to the effect of ousting their jurisdiction on the matters dealt with by agreement till the agreement is decided by an ordinary Court of law not to secure fair and reasonable compensation in terms of the statute. This course will at once explicate the arbiters' jurisdiction and lay on the party who is repudiating his own agreement the onus of having it set aside, which appears to me to be more in accordance with legal principle and practice than laying on the party June 16, 1908. founding on an agreement the onus of proving to the arbiters that it provides fair and reasonable compensation to the tenant. There would be no hardship in the course I venture to suggest, because no tenant would require to take legal proceedings to set aside an agreement unless he had himself been to blame for entering into an unreasonable one. And as to expense, a tenant could obtain a declarator in the Sheriff Court that the agreement was not fair and reasonable without much expense, whereas if an arbiter's award is, as suggested, to be challenged, the proceedings must be taken in the Court of Session.

Bell v.
Graham.
Lord Ardwall.

Another objection to its being left to the arbiters to decide whether an agreement is valid or not under the statute is that, supposing they erroneously reject an agreement, the arbitration proceedings, if not interdicted, will go on to completion, and all this will be thrown away should an action for reduction of the award be afterwards brought and carried to a successful issue.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Sheriff's judgment is right in substance, though not in form, and that if a tenant who has signed an agreement wishes an arbiter and oversman to disregard it, he must bring and succeed in an action of declarator to the effect that the agreement does not secure to the tenant fair and reasonable compensation in terms of section 5, and is therefore void in terms of section 36 of the statute.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the Lord President's opinion. I think that Lord Ardwall's opinion may fairly be said to represent what the Legislature ought to have enacted upon this subject, but I think the Lord President's opinion represents what it has enacted.

If I add anything it would only be an observation on the illustration suggested by Lord Low, when he compared the question of serious and wilful misconduct which arises under the Workmen's Compensation Act with the question which is raised by the present case. It is only an illustration, but the two provisions to be considered are so far analogous, in that they both are concerned with the mind and conscience of the person whose acts are under consideration. Now, I would apply the illustration in the following way, which, if not exactly, is at anyrate substantially the same as Lord Low's. This Court has never held that the question, whether a man's misconduct was to be regarded as serious and wilful or not, was, in any case, a question of law which the Court should determine. It has always been my opinion, and I think it is the opinion of the Courts who have considered these cases, that if there were a real question of fact, whether there was misconduct at the time of the accident, then it was for the arbiter to consider and determine finally that pure question of fact; but if he chose to state a case, in which facts were set forth, then the Court might inquire whether there was the minimum of fact in the case to warrant the arbiter's finding, because if there were no facts to warrant the finding, or fewer facts than the necessary minimum, which is the same thing, then we should be entitled to hold—and have held—that there was no question for the consideration of the arbiter any more than there is for the consideration of a jury when a pursuer has not adduced any evidence in support of his case.

June 16, 1908. Well, then, I think that we really proceed in the same way in regard to this matter, because in accordance with the Lord President's opinion, in which I concur, it is for the arbiter to consider whether this agreement between the parties was fair and reasonable having regard to the facts known at the time. The Court will only interfere with his award if it is satisfied that there was no serious consideration of this question by the arbiter, or if the circumstances upon which his judgment was based were such that no impartial person could have come to the conclusion at which he arrived on the facts. I should not be disposed to think that in every case the question of fairness and reasonableness is one for a Court of law; but in every case the arbiter himself must be fair and reasonable in his conduct, and if he ignores the statute and substitutes his own opinion as to the compensation to be awarded, then, undoubtedly, he has exceeded his jurisdiction, and can be corrected.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord President.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Justice-Clerk also concurs in my opinion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in answer to the question therein stated, that as the agreement tabled is challenged by the tenant as not being fair and reasonable under the circumstances, the arbiter is bound to decide that question for himself in order to determine his further procedure, but that he must bear in mind (1) that the criterion is the fairness and reasonableness of the agreement as viewed in the light of the circumstances at the time of making, and not the question as to whether it does or does not tally with the scale which the arbiter if left to himself would now apply; and (2) that the agreement being signed by both parties, it is necessary for the party seeking to hold it as not being fair and reasonable to condescend specifically on the provisions objected to, and to reasons for holding these provisions not fair and reasonable: Find and declare accordingly, and decern."

No. 159. GEORGE MORISON PAUL (Guardian of Joseph Thomson's Mortification), Petitioner.—Grainger Stewart.

July 4, 1908.

Guardian of Thomson's
Mortification.

Charitable Trust—Failure of purpose—Cy près—Grant of additional powers—No formal scheme—Nobile Officium.—The administrator of a charitable trust, founded in 1786 for the purpose of supplying to poor householders in Edinburgh oatmeal, or oats to be made into meal, at 10d. per peck (which was approximately half the market price in 1908), presented a petition to the Court in which, on the narrative that for many years it had been impossible to expend the whole income of the trust on the trust purposes, he craved for a grant of additional powers.

Circumstances in which the Court, without formally approving of a scheme, granted additional powers to enable the administrator to supply coal, milk, oatcakes, bread, or flour, at half the market price.

1st DIVISION. By deed of settlement dated 11th July 1774, and registered on the 13th of February 1786, Joseph Thomson, saddle-tree maker in Edinburgh, conveyed his whole estate to trustees for the purposes therein mentioned. The purpose with regard to the residue was declared to be as follows:—"And the whole residue of my estate, heritable and moveable, after payment of my debts, funeral charges, and the above-mentioned legacies, or such other legacies as I may afterwards give, and the expenses of carrying this settlement into execution, I mortify as a perpetual fund, the interest whereof is to be applied in manner after directed, for purchasing oatmeal, or oats to be made into meal, to be distributed only among poor householders within the city of Edinburgh when the price of oatmeal exceeds tenpence per peck, and which meal is to be sold out to these householders at tenpence per peck, be the current price ever so high; but I appoint that one family shall not get above two pecks of it in one week." By a subsequent deed of settlement he altered the foregoing provision as to the price of oatmeal exceeding tenpence per peck by declaring that the sales were not to be made unless the price exceeded one shilling per peck. A private Act of Parliament was obtained in 1846 to facilitate the sale of certain properties held by the administrators of the Mortification, but no alteration was made by that Act in the foregoing provision for the administration of the funds.

By the first mentioned deed of settlement the testator further provided that the securities in which the trust funds were to be invested should be taken in the names of certain persons holding official positions and their successors in office, among whom was mentioned the Depute-Keeper of the Signet. The other persons named having declined to accept the trust, the duty devolved upon the then Depute-Keeper of the Signet, who accepted office, and thereafter the trust was administered by him and his successors in the office of Depute-Keeper.

On 18th February 1908 Mr George Morison Paul, Depute-Keeper of the Signet, and as such guardian and administrator of the Joseph Thomson Mortification, presented a petition to the First Division craving for additional powers for the future administration of the trust.

The petitioner pointed out that, the current price of oatmeal being 1s. 8d. per peck, the beneficiaries of the Mortification were enabled to purchase it at half the market price, and stated:—"Of late years there has been a great decrease in the number of families applying for and receiving the benefit of the Mortification. . . . Every effort has been made to bring the existence of the charity under the notice of persons entitled to its benefits, and since he became guardian of the Mortification the petitioner has made every endeavour to increase the number of recipients of the charity. In 1906 he sent a circular explaining the benefits of the charity to every clergyman, missionary, parish sister, and bible woman, specially appointed by any church in Edinburgh, and he had the Mortification brought under the notice of the Charity Organisation Society and also of many of the ladies who work among the poor in the city. He has also kept the charity working during practically the whole year, but notwithstanding these efforts it has been found impossible to expend the annual income of the trust in the manner desired by the testator. . . . The capital of the trust in 1846, when the Act of Parliament above mentioned was obtained, was about £9550. The capital of the trust at 31st December 1907 amounted to £26,938, 10s. 9d." He also set forth figures shewing the decline in the number of families receiving the benefit of the Mortification for the last twenty-four years, and figures shewing the surplus income that it had been found impossible to expend on the purposes of the trust, the latter figures shewing that, for the last ten years, the net income had amounted, on an average, to £495 per annum, while it had only been possible to expend an average of £96 per annum in supplying applicants with cheap oatmeal.

The petitioner further averred:—"Notwithstanding the publicity given by the petitioner to the objects of the Mortification, the resources of the trust have not been taken advantage of to anything like the full extent, and the trust has thus for some time failed to carry out the benefits contemplated by the testator. This the petitioner believes is due to a complete change in the customs of the poor as regards the food which they give to their families, oatmeal for porridge or oatcakes being now comparatively little used. The petitioner believes that the testator desired both to benefit the necessitous poor and to encourage the consumption of oatmeal as an article of diet, and he thinks that both these intentions can now be carried out only if special attractions are extended to those making use of oatmeal. The supply of meal alone, even at a cheap price, has ceased to be a sufficient inducement. In these circumstances the petitioner makes the present application to the Court for an extension of his powers, with a view of more fully utilising the revenue of the trust, and of making it possible for the primary wish of the testator in regard to the supply of oatmeal to poor householders to be made effectual. He suggests that the main purpose of the Mortification might still be carried out if the guardian of the Mortification were empowered, in addition to supplying oatmeal to poor householders at a reduced rate as heretofore, to supply those families on the roll buying oatmeal also with a limited quantity of either coals or milk at a price below the current market price. Neither coals nor milk would be supplied except to those taking meal, and coals supplied at a cheaper rate could be used for the preparation of porridge, while milk supplied at a cheaper rate could be used along with the porridge. The present petition has been brought to obtain the authority of the Court to alter the conditions of the testator's deeds of settlement in the direction indicated. A statement of the new powers craved is appended hereto."

The petitioner prayed the Court "to grant to the petitioner and his successors in office the additional powers craved for the administration of the funds and estate of the said Joseph Thomson, now held by the petitioner, and to settle such other scheme as to your Lordships shall seem just," and the additional powers craved were stated in an appendix to the petition, as follows:—"Grant to the petitioner and his successors in office, as guardian or guardians of the funds and estate of the late Joseph Thomson, power in addition to the power to supply oatmeal to poor householders within the city of Edinburgh at the price of 10d. per peck of 8½ lbs., to supply to poor householders obtaining meal at said reduced rate coal at half the market price, or milk at half the market price, and that in such quantities and under such regulations and at such times as the guardian for the time being may appoint, and to defray out of the income from the funds of the Mortification the difference between the market price of said coals and milk and the reduced price."

The Court remitted to Mr James S. Leadbetter, advocate, to report. In his report, besides calling attention to the fact that the crave was for additional powers, and not, as was usual in such cases, for approval of a scheme, he reported in favour of the powers asked for, but also suggested that, in addition to these powers, the Court might grant authority to the petitioner to expend the income of the trust in July 4, 1908. supplying bread, flour, and oatcakes at half the market price.*

Guardian of Thomson's
Mortification.

* In his report the reporter stated, inter alia.:—"The petition is not, as is usual in such cases, for approval of a scheme, but is framed as a crave for additional powers. The distinction is only one of form and not of substance, but as the form is not the usual form, I have thought it right to refer to it. My attention has, however, been drawn to a petition presented by the trustees of the Carnegie Park Orphanage, in which the crave was not for approval of a scheme, but merely 'to reduce the limit of age for orphans,' &c., which was granted by the First Division of the Court on 12th March 1892—(reported 19 R. 605). I have also been referred to two other petitions (unreported) in which the additional powers asked for were not embodied in a scheme. Subject to these observations, I have to report that the procedure has been regular, and that no answers have been lodged. . . .

"The extension craved by the petitioner is that he should be authorised to sell at a reduced price coals and milk to those purchasing the oatmeal; the belief being that if these additional benefits were provided a larger number of persons would be induced to purchase oatmeal for the purpose of making it into porridge. I am informed that this extension has been suggested to those interested in administering the charity not only by applicants themselves, but also by other persons engaged in distributing charitable relief throughout the city. Subject to the observation contained in the immediately succeeding paragraph of this report, I would respectfully suggest that these additional powers would tend to facilitate the carrying out of the original purposes of the trust, and that they are therefore worthy of the favourable consideration of your Lordships.

"The petitioner, however, bases his crave for these additional powers on the belief that 'the testator desired both to benefit the necessitous poor and to encourage the consumption of oatmeal as an article of diet.' I am not satisfied that the latter is a legitimate inference as to the intentions of the testator. As far as I have been able to ascertain from the writings of those who deal with the social life of the people of Scotland at the close of the eighteenth century, it would appear that at the time when the charity was founded—viz., 1774 and 1786—the consumption of wheaten bread in cities was comparatively small, and was confined to the well-to-do classes, while the poor subsisted almost entirely on oatmeal. It would seem then that a more legitimate inference as to the intention of the testator is that he desired to relieve the necessitous poor in times of distress by enabling them to obtain their staple article of diet—viz., oatmeal—at a reduced price. The petitioner attributes the present difficulty in administering the charity to a 'complete change in the customs of the poor as regards the food which they give to their families, oatmeal for porridge or oatcakes being now comparatively little used.' Their place has been largely taken by wheaten bread; and there is also, I am informed, the farther change of habit that these classes do not now buy their food in the form of meal, but buy it already prepared in the form of bread or oatcakes. I would therefore respectfully suggest for the consideration of your Lordships whether the primary object of the testator will not be more nearly attained by authorising the petitioner to expend the surplus income of the trust funds in supplying necessitous persons with bread and flour and oatcakes at a reduced price, rather than with coals and milk. At the same time, it is to be noted that those interested in charitable work among the poor greatly deplore the change of customs above referred to, by which porridge has so largely dropped out of the staple diet of the poorer classes, and that would appear to be a reason for giving a favourable consideration to the proposed supply of coals and milk, although these articles themselves are perhaps not so directly in line with the original purpose of the testator. The suggestion

At the hearing in the Summar-roll on 4th July 1908, counsel for the petitioner moved the Court to grant the additional powers suggested by the reporter as well as those originally craved for in the petition.

LORD M'LAREN intimated that the Court (LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNEAR, and LORD DUNDAS) would grant all the powers suggested, and, further, would not restrict the power to supply coals and milk to those householders only who were being supplied with meal.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Grant to the petitioner and his successors in office as guardian or guardians of the funds and estate of the late Joseph Thomson, in addition to the power to supply oatmeal to poor householders within the city of Edinburgh, at the price of 10d. per peck of 8½ lbs., power to supply to such poor householders coal, milk, oatcakes, bread, or flour, at half the market price; and all these in such quantities and under such regulations and at such times as the guardian for the time being may appoint, and to defray out of the income from the funds of the mortification the difference between the market price of said commodities and the reduced price: Ordain the additional powers hereby granted to be recorded in the Books of Council and Session for preservation, and decern."

as to the supply of bread and flour and oatcakes, in addition to coals and milk, has been laid before the petitioner, and he acquiesces in it, and expresses himself as anxious to obtain any additional powers which will enable him to expend the income of the trust-estate for the relief of those for whose benefit it was intended, as he is not satisfied that the addition of coals and milk alone would enable him to exhaust the funds at his disposal. . . ."

The reporter submitted that if these views were approved effect might be given to them by granting authority to the petitioner in the following terms:—

"Grant to the petitioner . . . powers—in addition to the power to supply oatmeal to poor householders within the city of Edinburgh at the price of 10d. per peck of 8½ lbs.—to supply to poor householders obtaining meal at said reduced rate coal at half the market price, or milk at half the market price, and also power to supply to poor householders within the city of Edinburgh oatcakes at half the market price, or bread at half the market price, or flour at half the market price; and all these in such quantities and under such regulations and at such times as the guardian for the time being may appoint. . . ."

Vict. cap. 68).—A parish council presented a petition to the Sheriff, under July 4, 1908. the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, praying him to designate certain lands as a burial ground. Objections were lodged by a conterminous proprietor, whose lands were separated from the proposed burial ground by a burn, on the ground that the burn would be polluted by the drainage from the burial ground. The Sheriff repelled the objections, designated the ground, and awarded expenses against the objector. The objector, being charged for the expenses, brought a suspension of the charge, on the ground that the award of expenses was ultra vires of the Sheriff.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Johnston) that the proceedings were administrative and not judicial, and that, the objections not being vexatious, the Sheriff was not entitled to award expenses against the objector; and charge suspended.

Question, whether in a case of vexatious opposition expenses may be awarded by a Sheriff in an administrative proceeding.

County Council of Dumbarton v. Clydebank Commissioners, Nov. 14, 1901, 4 F. 111, commented on.

IN May 1906 the Parish Council of Ballingry, as coming in place of the old parochial board, presented a petition, under the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855,* to the Sheriff of Fife and Kinross, praying the Court to designate and set apart a certain portion of ground, being part of the glebe lands of the parish of Ballingry, for the purposes of a burial ground for the parish, "and to find any person offering objections thereto liable in expenses."

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Johnston.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hay Shennan), having considered the petition, appointed intimation thereof to be made by advertisement and by handbills, calling upon any party interested, who might desire to oppose the application, to lodge a notice of appearance with the Clerk of Court at Kirkcaldy within ten days. A notice of appearance was lodged for William John Norbray Liddall of Navitie, whose property extended along the boundary of the ground proposed to be designated for the space of 517 feet 6 inches or thereby, being separated therefrom by a burn, which subsequently flowed through the lower portion of his estate. He lodged objections complaining of the proposed

* The Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. cap. 68), sec. 10, enacts, inter alia:—"Whenever any burial ground shall have been closed by order in council, the Parochial Board shall forthwith proceed to provide a suitable and convenient burial ground for the parish, and to make arrangements for facilitating interments therein; and in the event of a suitable burial ground not being provided by the Parochial Board within six months after such order or requisition as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such Board, or for any ten or more persons assessed for relief of the poor in the parish, or any two or more members of the Parochial Board, to apply by summary petition to the Sheriff, to have a suitable portion of land designated for the purpose of a burial ground; and the Sheriff shall examine such witnesses and make such inquiry as he shall think proper, and shall keep a note of such evidence as may be adduced, and, if he thinks fit, shall thereupon proceed to designate and set apart such portion as he may deem necessary of any lands in such parish suitable for the purpose, not being part of any policy, pleasure ground, or garden attached to any dwelling-house; provided always that due intimation shall have been given of not less than ten days to the owner of such lands, that he may be heard for his interest before such designation is actually made, subject always to an appeal to any of the Lords Ordinary of the Court of Session, whose decision shall be final, such appeal always being presented within fourteen days of the date of the Sheriff's judgment."

designation, for the reasons, inter alia, that the whole drainage of the ground proposed to be designated was into the burn, and that the burn would be rendered unsuitable for the primary purposes for which it was used if the drainage of the burial ground were allowed to run into it.

On 28th July 1906 the Sheriff-substitute, after an inquiry, and the examination of witnesses, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the objections for the complaining objector: Designates the portion of ground described in the prayer of the petition as fitting for the purposes of a burial ground for the parish of Ballingry: Finds the petitioners entitled, as against the objector, to such expenses as have been caused by his appearance and opposition: Allows an account," &c.* The account of these expenses was taxed at £48, 4s. 3d., and decree for that amount was pronounced. The objector, having failed to make payment of these expenses, was charged under the extract decree on 11th March 1907.

Against this charge Mr Liddall presented a note of suspension, in which he averred, inter alia:—"In holding the said inquiry as to the suitability of the ground and examining the witnesses, the Sheriff-substitute was acting in a purely administrative capacity. He had no power or jurisdiction to award expenses against the complainer as comparing objector. The Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, confers no power upon the Sheriff to award expenses; and the Sheriff, in making such an award, was acting outwith the scope of his powers. By section 26 of the said Act, it is, inter alia, provided that the expenses incurred by the parochial board of any parish, in carrying the Act into execution, in so far as not otherwise met, shall be levied by assessment. In consequence of the objections stated by the complainer, it is now settled that the drainage of the area of ground designated as a cemetery, and the filtration and purification of the water therefrom, will be properly seen to."

He pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said decree for expenses having

* In his note the Sheriff-substitute stated, inter alia:—"As I have said, substantially the only question is whether the ground is suitable for a cemetery. The objector concedes that the upper part is suitable; but the lower part, he says, is not suitable, being clayey and waterlogged, and incapable of being efficiently drained. To a certain extent the objections are established, but not completely. The peculiarity of the case is that it does not seem possible to get better soil in a convenient situation in the parish, and, indeed, there is not direct evidence of better soil anywhere else in the parish. You have the additional consideration that the present cemetery is already there, so that if, by drainage and provision for filtration, the ground can be improved sufficiently in condition, the balance of convenience points to taking it. . . . I am not deciding that the suggested drainage scheme is sufficient. All I do decide is that the ground is suitable for designation as a burial ground, subject to efficient drainage operations and provision for filtration and purification. The petitioners must arrange for this before a portion of the ground could be used. It is, of course, possible that the lowest area to the north-east might be used for mortuary and for offices. That is for petitioners to consider. They have set before me a prima facie good case for the possibility of the necessary works being executed, and that is all I require here. Nothing that I decide just now will afford any justification for petitioners injuriously affecting the burn by introducing deleterious drainage from the cemetery into it. Having in view Mr Bennett's cogent criticism of the tentative scheme, they must see that an efficient scheme is provided."

been ultra vires of the Sheriff-substitute, the charge proceeding thereon ought to be suspended; (2) the Sheriff-substitute having acted in the said inquiry in an administrative capacity, and having had no jurisdiction to pronounce the said decree for expenses, the complainer is entitled to suspension, as craved.

Liddall v.
Ballingry
Parish Council.

On 3d April 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) passed the note, and on 31st October 1907, after a hearing in the Procedure-roll, he pronounced an interlocutor suspending the charge.*

* "OPINION.—Mr Liddall of Navitie, under this suspension, complains that he has been charged, at the instance of the Parish Council of Ballingry, on an extract decree for expenses pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute of Fife, which the latter had no power to grant.

"The circumstances are these: The Parish Council of Ballingry, as coming in place of the old Parochial Board, in May 1906 presented a petition to the Sheriff of Fife, by virtue of the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, praying him to designate 4½ acres of the glebe lands of Ballingry for the purposes of a burial ground for the parish. The prayer of this petition concluded by craving the Sheriff to find any person offering objections to the petition liable in expenses. I am of opinion that neither were the Parish Council warranted in concluding for expenses, nor had the Sheriff-substitute power to award them under said petition. That he should have even done so on the merits, had he the power, is unintelligible, his whole reasoning leading to an opposite conclusion, and proving that Mr Liddall's opposition was not only necessary but advantageous, in the public interest as well as in his own, and amply justified by the result. But the question before me does not depend on the merits, but on the competency of the Sheriff's award.

"The Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, provides for the closing of burial grounds which have become dangerous to the public health or offensive to public decency, and for the provision of burial grounds, whether existing burial grounds have been so closed or not. In relation to this matter, certain authority is given to the Sheriff, subject to an appeal to a Lord Ordinary of the Court of Session; but I think that the very subject-matter of the authority committed to the Sheriff raises the prima facie presumption that his action will be ministerial, and not judicial. This is amply confirmed by the provisions of the statute when these are examined in detail.

"The Sheriff is first called in by section 3, when it is proposed to put the statute into operation, where a parish is partly burghal and partly landward, to determine whether, for the purposes of the Act, such parish is to be deemed burghal or landward. And where application is made to him for that purpose, he is to hear 'any parties having interest.'

"In the next place, by sections 4 to 8, the Sheriff may be applied to not merely by the Parochial Board, but by any ten persons assessed for relief of the poor, or any two householders residing within 100 yards of an existing or proposed burial ground, to determine whether such burial ground is or would be dangerous to public health, or offensive to public decency. The provisions for the procedure on such application require the Sheriff 'to permit all parties whom he shall judge to have an interest to appear and be heard in such manner as he shall deem fitting.' He is to make inquiry; and if satisfied of the truth of the allegations of the applicants, he is to pronounce an interlocutor to such effect, and transmit a copy to the Home Secretary, whereupon an order in council is to be pronounced, closing the existing or prohibiting the opening of the proposed burial ground. In this branch of the statute there is no provision for appeal, but there is a prohibition of the renewal of the application to the Sheriff, except with the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal, till after the lapse of five years. In both these provisions

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) The Sheriff-substitute here was acting in a judicial or quasi judicial capacity, and therefore had a right to award expenses. Every Court had an inherent right to award expenses, even Justices of the Peace,¹ and arbiters although no such power was given in the deed of submission.² Where the jurisdiction of the Sheriff was invoked by statute the presumption was that he was called in as Sheriff, i.e., in his judicial capacity.³ That was emphasised by the procedure to be followed in such petitions as this, which was really judicial procedure, and especially by the existence of the right of appeal.⁴ The Court had dealt with the question of expenses in analogous applications.⁵ The comparison with the practice of Parliamentary Committees was of no weight; the fact that they did not award expenses was merely the result of a it is quite clear that the Sheriff is acting ministerially, and this is accentuated by the clause to which I have last referred; to enable him to deal properly with such application, it is manifestly necessary and to the public advantage that all having interest should be heard.

“Then there follow in sections 9 to 14 enactments for the provision of burial grounds for parishes, and I think also of additional ground to be added to an existing burial ground, and that whether the burial ground of the parish has been ordered to be closed or not. So far as I am concerned, the important sections are 10 and 13. Section 10 provides for the Parochial Board, any ten ratepayers, or any two members of the Board, applying by summary petition to the Sheriff to have a suitable portion of land designated. And after examining witnesses, of whose evidence he shall keep a note, and making inquiry, the Sheriff is to proceed to designate and set apart such portion as he may deem necessary ‘of any lands in such parish suitable for the purpose,’ provided that due intimation is first given to the owner of such lands, that he may be heard for his interest before such designation is actually made. Then section 13 incorporates the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, which, in effect, makes the Sheriff’s designation of a parcel of land for the purpose of a burial ground the equivalent of a private Act or Provisional Order, and confers compulsory powers on the Parochial Board, as promoters of the undertaking, to acquire the land designated by the Sheriff. It is somewhat strange that the 10th section should only provide expressly for the owner of such lands being heard for his interest, but I think that the Sheriff-substitute, having regard to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, did right in giving a wide interpretation to the word ‘owner,’ and in holding it to include anyone who, as Mr Liddall, might be injuriously affected, in respect, for instance, that the land proposed to be taken marched with his estate, and was only separated therefrom by a burn, in the water of which he had the rights of a riparian proprietor, and which water was liable to be custom that had grown up. It was difficult to draw a distinction between administrative and judicial proceedings. Judicial capacity was constantly invoked in matters primarily administrative, and half the work of a Judge in judicial proceedings was really administrative. In such an application as this the strictly administrative proceedings only extended to questions with the owner of the ground proposed to be taken; the proceedings became judicial as soon as an outside objector appeared, as had happened here. (2) If it were competent for the Sheriff to award expenses, this was clearly a case for doing so. The objector had no right to appear in these proceedings on the grounds he had stated. His proper remedy was by an action against the Parish Council for pollution. It was wrong to say that he had come forward in the public interest; he had come forward purely in the private interest of his own estate. His appearance in these proceedings was unnecessary and vexatious, and having been unsuccessful.

polluted by drainage from the proposed cemetery. I cannot understand the reasoning of the Sheriff-substitute's note, in which he indicates that he was prepared to be satisfied of the suitability of the ground, chiefly because it was the only ground possible, without satisfying himself that either there would be no injurious affection of the burn by pollution, or that proper precautions were to be taken to prevent it, and which led him to proceed to designate the land, with a mere warning that 'having in view Mr Bennett's (that is, Mr Liddall's adviser's) cogent criticism of the tentative scheme, they (the Parochial Board) must see that an efficient scheme is provided.' It is manifest that, but for Mr Liddall's appearance, whether statutorily entitled or not, the drainage question would never have been considered, and must have subsequently been raised between him and the Parochial Board, in the form of an action for nuisance.

"In this third class of applications to the Sheriff an appeal is given to a Lord Ordinary of the Court of Session, but, notwithstanding, I cannot hold the proceeding, either before the Sheriff or before the Lord Ordinary, to be anything but ministerial. Of this, I think it is sufficiently conclusive that by section 13 is committed to the Sheriff the functions of a Parliamentary committee on a private bill, and to the Lord Ordinary the functions of the House on report.

"As the statute makes no provision as to expenses, except by saying (section 26) that the expenses incurred by the Parochial Board in carrying the Act into execution, so far as not covered by burial fees, are to be raised by assessment, the complainer here maintains that the Sheriff-substitute, in his final deliverance on the Board's application, had no power to award expenses against him; while the respondents maintain that he was entitled to do so by virtue of his common law powers. I am of opinion that he had no such common law powers; and that having no statutory power, he was acting ultra vires in awarding expenses against Mr Liddall.

"That he was acting ministerially I think cannot be doubted, and I refer to Binning v. Easton & Sons, 8 F. 407, and to Hughes v. Thistle Chemical Co., 1907, S. C. 607.

"The Ecclesiastical Buildings and Glebes (Scotland) Act, 1868, is an Act of somewhat similar character. Though it provides for appeal to the Sheriff, and ultimately to the Lord Ordinary in teind causes, from proceedings in the Church Courts, and there is therefore rather more to be said for such an appeal being of a judicial character than for one under the statute in question, yet by section 15 of the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act it was thought necessary to give express power to the Sheriff and Lord Ordinary to award expenses.

"Two categories of cases were referred to as authorities on this subject. First, those in which summary complaints of a merely quasi criminal cessful he ought in ordinary course to make good the expense he had caused.

Argued for the complainer and respondent;—(1) Where a Sheriff was acting in an administrative capacity, as here, he had no common law power to award expenses. The inherent right to do so, which might be said to exist in Parliamentary Committees (though they did not exercise it), did not extend to a Sheriff, for in such cases he had merely a delegated authority to act in a legislative manner, and his powers were limited by the terms in which the function was delegated to him. He could only have the power to award expenses if it were clear from the statute that it was the ordinary jurisdiction of his Court that was invoked, or if the statute expressly gave him the power. The test of whether the Sheriff's ordinary jurisdiction was invoked was stated by Lord Adam in *Main v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company*¹ to be whether it could be shewn that the statute "intended to invoke the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court with all its ordinary methods of procedure." Applying that test to the Burial Grounds Act, it was clear that it did not invoke the ordinary procedure of the Court, for it provided a special form of procedure and a special mode of appeal.² Nor was a power to award expenses expressly given, as was done in many statutes which delegated admini-character were concerned, as in Ledgerwood v. M'Kenna, 7 Macph. 261, where opinions were expressed that Justices without any express power might competently award expenses in a complaint under that Act; but I think it is sufficient to say of that case that the Justices were assumed to be acting judicially. Then in the analogous case of Nimmo v. Clark & Wilson, 10 Macph. 477, being an appeal to the Court of Session from a conviction by the Sheriff for contravention of the Mines Regulation Act, 1860, the question was raised whether the Court of Session, to whom the appeal was taken, could award expenses even in the appeal, there being no provision for an award of expenses in the original complaint. There was no suggestion that the Sheriff could have awarded expenses in the Court below; and the Court held that, on the analogy of the practice in the Judiciary Court in appeals from convictions of a criminal character, they were entitled to award expenses in similar appeals from convictions of a similar character.

"The other category of cases to which I was referred was that in which the Sheriff acts, as in the Burgh Police Act, 1892, in the matter of extension of burgh boundaries, definition of drainage and water areas, &c., and it was pointed out that in County Council of Dumbarton v. Commissioners of Clydebank, 4 F. 111, the Court, on a statutory appeal from the Sheriff, had assumed the power of awarding expenses, both before them and in the Court below, of a successful opposition to the Magistrates' application, although the statute made no provision for expenses. I have some difficulty in understanding that decision; and, looking to what Lord M'Laren says, I cannot regard it as a considered judgment upon the point, and can only explain it to my own mind by assuming that, in the peculiar circumstances of the case, and to mark their sense of the improper and harassing conduct of the local commissioners, the Court used their nobile officium to do that which neither they nor the Sheriff had power under the statute or at common law to do. But this does not infer that the Sheriff had any power at his own hand to do the same; and in support of my view I refer to White v. Magistrates of Rutherglen, 24 R. 447.

"I therefore propose to suspend the charge, with expenses."

 expenses did not apply, for such appeals came before the Court of Session in its ordinary capacity as a Court of Justice, and not in an administrative capacity. Although the expenses of the Sheriff Court proceedings had been awarded by the Court of Session in Dumbarton County Council v. Clydebank Commissioners,³ that was specially done on the ground of oppression, and, further, it was no authority for the view that the Sheriff could have done so at his own hand. (2) In any event, the opposition of the objector here had not been such as to justify an award of expenses against him. He had appeared in response to an intimation ordered by the Sheriff calling for objections. He had an interest to object to the pollution of the burn, not only on account of his own property, but on behalf of the inhabitants of the village through which the burn flowed. And he had been successful to this extent, that the Sheriff had condemned the tentative drainage scheme of the Parish Council, and had indicated that a more efficient scheme must be provided.

At advising on 4th July 1908,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary disposing of an application for suspension of a decree for expenses and of a charge following thereon. The case arose out of an application made to the Sheriff under the Burial Grounds Act by the Parish Council of Ballingry to have a certain piece of ground set apart as a burial ground. In the proceedings which followed Mr Liddall appeared as an objector. The Sheriff repelled his objections, and found the petitioners entitled as against him to such expenses as had been caused by his appearance and opposition. Mr Liddall has been charged for payment under this decree, and has brought this suspension, in which he prays the Court to suspend the charge and the whole grounds and warrants thereof. Opposition was offered, I believe, by Mr Liddall upon the ground that the opening of a burial ground in this place would pollute a stream which flows through the parish, and in which Mr Liddall has an interest as a conterminous proprietor. I do not know that we are much concerned with the grounds of opposition except to see that they are not factious or vexatious. The Sheriff in the exercise of what he considered to be his jurisdiction made an award of expenses. The question is, had the Sheriff power to make such an award? The argument of the suspender is that the Sheriff was exercising an administrative jurisdiction to which the rules that regulate the awarding of expenses in ordinary actions do not apply. There are different ways in Liddall v.

Ballingry
Council.

Lord M'Laren.

In the first place, this is an administrative proceeding under which the Sheriff is asked to sanction the compulsory acquisition of land. If the local authority does not move, and it is necessary to apply to the Sheriff, then, even if the proprietor is willing to sell and every other necessary consent is obtained, the Sheriff must investigate the circumstances and must be satisfied that it is in the interests of the parish that the burial ground should be acquired. The cost of finding the evidence and of laying it before the Sheriff must be borne by the parish even where there is no opposition. Theoretically the expense of the promoters is just the same whether the application is opposed or unopposed. As a matter of fact the case of the promoters will be got up in a more careful, and therefore in a more expensive, way when opposition is expected than it would otherwise be. But it is difficult to distinguish between the cost of laying before the Sheriff evidence which is necessary to establish the case of the promoters and that which is required to meet adverse evidence, and this difficulty is an argument against treating the expenses of opposition as litigious expenses.

Next we have to consider that opposition is not necessarily of a litigious character. Where land has to be taken for the formation of a burying ground, a proprietor whose land is to be taken, but who objects to parting with it, may, if he wishes to be troublesome, insist that the value of his land be assessed by a jury, or he may in any case ask for an arbitration under the conditions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. The same consideration applies to anyone who considers that his land will be injuriously affected. Mr Liddall made no pecuniary claim. He came in the interest of the parish to complain of the pollution of a stream in which all the parish was interested. Mr Liddall was not appearing for himself; he had a right to appear under the conditions of the statute. A person who appears to lay considerations before the Sheriff which the promoters might not be expected to put before him, is really coming forward in the public interest, and such a person should not be treated as a contentious litigant. I see nothing to shew that Mr Liddall appeared except to see that an object laudable in itself should not be made injurious to the public in other ways.

Again, in an ordinary action expenses are awarded on the ground that the party is entitled to be indemnified for the expense to which he has been put in defending his rights or enforcing his claim, but this ground of judgment is not available where the proceedings are administrative. I say nothing as to cases in which the right to appear is abused and as to whether expenses should be awarded in such cases.

The power of expropriating lands for purposes of public utility is an element of the sovereign right of the State, and can only be exercised by Parliament. According to the common law of Parliament expenses are not given to or against parties promoting private bills, but by the standing orders expenses may be awarded in cases of vexatious opposition. When Parliament delegates its powers to a local authority, without making provision as to expenses, the natural conclusion is that these powers are given under the same conditions which regulate the practice of Parliament.

 limits, I am unable to see that there is any authority for treating it as hostile litigation to be followed by an award of expenses to the successful party. But where opposition is vexatious, I should not be disposed to doubt that the local authority, in this case the Sheriff, would have authority to deal with the opposition in the same way as Parliament would deal with such a case. But it is not necessary to consider that question for the purposes of the present case, except in so far as it touches upon the points raised in the case of the County Council of Dumbarton v. Clydebank Burgh Commissioners,¹ which has been cited to your Lordships as an authority for allowing expenses in an administrative proceeding. This was the case of a second application by the burgh of Clydebank asking for an extension of its boundaries at the expense of the county. It was keenly contested, and large expenses were incurred. The second application, like the first, was refused, and the Lord President in giving judgment said—"It appears to me that the case of *White v. The Magistrates of Rutherglen*² is not an authority for the proposition that under no circumstances can or should expenses be awarded to the persons who have successfully resisted an application of this kind. A similar application was made by the burgh of Clydebank in 1890, and it was successfully resisted, the petition having been refused by Sheriff Blair in 1891, and the persons (or the interests) who were then successful have had to defend themselves again. I think it not doubtful that the Court has power to award expenses, and that this is a clear case for awarding them.

"Serious oppression might result if suburban owners or administrative bodies could be called upon to defend themselves again and again from such applications by a wealthy burgh.

"Whether this is a litigation or an administrative proceeding, the unsuccessful applicants shall in the circumstances of the present case pay the expenses of the parties whom they convened and who successfully defended themselves."

In that case I am reported to have said—"My only doubt is whether, seeing that this is a statutory proceeding, our jurisdiction extends to the awarding of expenses incurred in the inferior Court. That is a question on the terms of the statute, and it is never safe to express an opinion on the construction of a statute without having it read and hearing argument on it. As this point was not taken, I do not need to consider it for the purposes of the case." I do not refer to my opinion as bearing on the merits of the question, but only because it is there pointed out that the distinction between the expenses of the local inquiry and the expenses of the appeal had not been argued, and because I do not think the Court intended to lay down a rule of general application which had not been tabled in discussion. But whatever was the ground of the decision, it appears to me that the general question as to expenses following the event in such applications was not raised and argued at the bar. I have every reason to believe that the judgment in the circumstances of that case was sound, and that it is an authority for the proposition that in a case of vexatious opposition expenses may be awarded in an administrative proceeding.

Liddall v.
Ballingry
Parish

Ld. M'Laren.

The ground upon which the Lord President's judgment proceeds is that the application was vexatious, being the second application upon grounds quite insufficient to support the proposed extension. I should like to consider it, if possible, an open question, whether the question of expenses is wholly a circumstantial question to be raised afresh in every case, or whether it is a general rule that parties appearing before the Sheriff in such proceedings are not liable in expenses. But in any case I am prepared to hold that in the absence of such special circumstances as justify the Court in coming to the conclusion that the party puts himself in the position of a contentious litigant there is no ground or authority for awarding expenses against such a party merely because his application has been unsuccessful. I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary is right, and that his judgment should be upheld.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree generally with the Lord Ordinary, and with what has been said by your Lordship in the chair. I think the Sheriff-substitute was sitting in a purely administrative, and not in his judicial, capacity; and that he was not, in the circumstances, entitled to award expenses against Mr Liddall.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

Ship—Collision—Compulsory Pilotage—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 604 (1).—The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 60), enacts:—Section 604 (1).—The master of every ship carrying passengers between any place in the British Islands and any other place so situate shall, while navigating within the limits of any district for which pilots are licensed under this or any other Act, employ a qualified pilot. . . ."

The steamship "Eildon" on a voyage from Leith to Dunkirk called at Middlesborough to complete her cargo. She carried a number of passengers, who were all booked for the voyage from Leith to Dunkirk. On arrival at Middlesborough the "Eildon" loaded cargo at Cochrane's Wharf and then proceeded up the Tees to Dent's Wharf, both within the port of Middlesborough, in charge of a licensed pilot, to take in further cargo. While in the river off Dent's Wharf she collided with the lighter "Hebe" and her tug the "Thames."

In an action of damages brought by the owners of the "Hebe" and of the "Thames" against the owners of the "Eildon," the defence was that the "Eildon" was carrying passengers between Leith and Middlesborough, and that when the collision occurred she was within a pilotage district and was compelled by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 604 (1), to employ a licensed pilot, and that, having done so, she was not responsible.

The pursuers contended that as the only passengers on board the "Eildon" July 7, 1908. were booked for the voyage from Leith to Dunkirk, the section did not apply.

The Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) held that the "Eildon" was carrying passengers between Leith and Middlesborough within the meaning of the Act, and that the section applied. Watson v. Gibson & Co.

The pursuers having reclaimed, the Second Division repelled the defenders' plea of compulsory pilotage:—Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Ardwall holding that the passengers booked for Dunkirk could not be regarded as passengers between places in the British Islands in the sense of the Act, Lord Low holding that although the Act applied to the voyage between Leith and Middlesborough, it ceased to do so when the vessel arrived at Middlesborough, and that even if the vessel were carrying passengers between Cochrane's Wharf and Dent's Wharf they could not be regarded as separate "places" in the sense of the Act, both being in the port of Middlesborough.

JAMES WATSON AND OTHERS, owners of the lighter "Hebe" of 2^D DIVISION. Newcastle, and Mark H. Redhead, owner of the steam-tug "Thames" of Newcastle, brought an action against George Gibson & Company, owners of the steamship "Eildon" of Leith, in which they concluded for damages for a collision, which took place in the River Tees off Dent's Wharf, Middlesborough, between the "Hebe" and the "Thames" on the one hand, and the "Eildon" on the other. Lord Salvesen.

The pursuers averred that the collision was caused by the fault of those in charge of the "Eildon."

The defenders stated that at the time of the collision the "Eildon" was in charge of a pilot whom they were compelled to employ.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) Separatim, the defenders' vessel being at the time of the collisions in charge of a pilot whose employment was compulsory, and the collisions, if due to the fault of anyone on board the defenders' vessel, being due to his fault, the defenders should be assoilzied.*

The pursuers pleaded;—(3) The defenders' averments as to compulsory pilotage being irrelevant, their second plea ought to be repelled.

The following narrative of the facts admitted is taken from the judgment of Lord Ardwall:—"The 'Eildon' was on a voyage from Leith to Dunkirk, but required to call at Middlesborough to fill up her cargo. She loaded at Leith and took on board part of her cargo and a number of passengers. The passengers were all booked to Dunkirk and paid their fares in respect of such booking. No passengers were booked from Leith to Middlesborough. When the 'Eildon' arrived at Middlesborough, she first proceeded to a wharf known as Cochrane's Wharf, where she took in further cargo. She then proceeded up the river under the charge of a pilot to take on board other cargo at Dent's Wharf, and it was while she was in the river off Dent's Wharf that the collision complained of took place. After taking in more cargo at Dent's Wharf the 'Eildon' proceeded to Dunkirk, where her passengers and cargo were all landed."

The place where the collision occurred is within the district for which pilots are licensed by the Tees Pilotage Commissioners.

On 18th March 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) repelled the third plea in law for the pursuers, and allowed a proof.†

* See section 604 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which is quoted in the rubric.

† "OPINION.—This is an action of damages arising out of a collision which took place between the lighter 'Hebe,' in tow of the steam tug 'Thames,' and the s.s. 'Eildon,' of Leith. The sole question argued was July 7, 1908.

Watson v.
Gibson & Co.

The pursuers reclaimed. The case was heard before the Second Division on 17th June 1908.

Argued for the pursuers and reclaimers;—It was clear that pilotage was compulsory under this subsection only in the case of vessels carrying passengers "between any place in the British Islands and any other place so situate."¹ At the time of the collision the "Eildon" was not in that position. No person could be a passenger unless he was carried under a contract with the owners.² Here the owners had not contracted to carry anybody from Leith to Middlesborough. All the passengers had booked from Leith to Dunkirk. Accordingly the "Eildon" was not carrying passengers between Leith and Middlesborough. The defenders' argument involved the consequence that every passenger ship navigating within the district must employ a licensed pilot. That was tantamount to reading the words "between whether, under the circumstances narrated by the defenders, the defence of compulsory pilotage is open to them.

"The admitted facts are as follows:—(His Lordship stated the facts). These being the facts, the defenders contend that section 604, subsection 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, required them to employ a qualified pilot in the Tees, and accordingly that they are not liable for any negligence which he may have committed in the course of the navigation of the 'Eildon.' The material part of the section is in the following terms:—(His Lordship quoted the subsection). In the case of the 'Osprey,' 5 F. (J. C.) 16, Lord Adam observed that this enactment was obviously made 'for the protection of human life.' It may have been so, but in that case it is singularly incomplete, because there is no enactment that, on the return journey from Dunkirk to Middlesborough, the vessel must employ a pilot in the Tees pilotage district, although the risk to the passengers from the vessel navigating these narrow waters is obviously the same whether the ship is approaching Middlesborough from Leith or from Dunkirk. I have, however, nothing to do with the anomalies of legislation, except in so far as they may have a possible bearing on interpretation; and I do not see how the purpose of the enactment can, in this case, afford any aid in construing the enactment itself. The 'Eildon' was admittedly carrying passengers between Leith and Middlesborough, and therefore the enactment would appear prima facie to apply. Does it then make any difference that none of the passengers were to be landed at Middlesborough; and is it implied in the section, as the pursuers argued, that a vessel is not carrying passengers between two British ports if the passengers are, in fact, booked to a foreign port, which is the ultimate destination of the ship? In my opinion it would be introducing an additional anomaly into this code of legislation if I were so to hold. The result would be that if a couple of passengers had booked from Leith to Middlesborough, the master would require to engage a pilot for the Tees; but if they were all going to Dunkirk, he would be exempt from compulsory pilotage. Whether the object of the enactment be to protect human life, or merely to secure employment for home pilots, such a distinction would be equally meaningless. I have accordingly no difficulty in repelling the pursuers' third plea in law, and as the case was sent on their motion to the Procedure-roll, I shall find them liable in expenses since the closing of the record. On the pleadings as they stand, I shall allow parties a proof, which will enable the pursuers, if they choose, to take the case further at this stage."

any place in the British Islands and any other place so situate" as if July 7, 1908. they had been "navigating within the district." That was an inadmissible construction, and was inconsistent with section 596,¹ which contemplated the employment of unqualified pilots. The case of *The "Rutland"*² did not touch the present. It only decided that a ship did not lose her character as a trading ship because she did not put out or take in cargo at a particular port. Even if the "Eildon" were bound to carry a pilot on the voyage to Middlesborough, the obligation ceased as soon as she arrived at that port.³ She was an arrived ship as soon as she reached Cochrane's Wharf, and therefore she was not bound to have a pilot on board at the time when the collision took place. The contention that Cochrane's Wharf and Dent's Wharf were separate places within the meaning of the section was unsound. "Place" meant "port" or place ejusdem generis with port. But in any view, two different wharves in the same port were not separate places within the meaning of the section. *Dublin Port and Docks Board v. Shannon*⁴ was distinguishable. The two termini there were not in the same port.

Gibson & Co.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—The defenders were bound to employ a licensed pilot if the "Eildon" was carrying passengers between two places in the United Kingdom. In the present case that condition was fulfilled. In the first place, the "Eildon" was carrying passengers between Leith and Middlesborough. It was immaterial that none of the passengers were to leave the ship at Middlesborough.⁵ The pursuers' argument on this head could not have been maintained if there had been even one passenger who was to disembark at Middlesborough, and it was unreasonable to suppose that the absence of this one passenger should deprive all the other passengers of the protection provided by the Legislature. Section 596⁶ merely provided that in certain circumstances no penalty should be exacted if an unqualified pilot were employed. It did not touch the obligation of a passenger ship to employ a pilot. Even if the "Eildon" was an arrived ship, she was still bound to carry a pilot, because she was carrying passengers between Cochrane's Wharf and Dent's Wharf. These were both places in the United Kingdom, and it was immaterial that they were both in the same port.⁷ The argument that "place" meant "port" was unsound. "Port" was defined as including "place."⁸ The "Servia"⁹ was not in point. It turned on the construction of another Act of Parliament. Counsel also referred to section 625 (5) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.¹⁰

The sole question argued at this stage of the case was whether, under the circumstances narrated by the defenders the defence of compulsory pilotage is open to them. This question has been decided by the Lord Ordinary in the affirmative, and he has accordingly repelled the third plea in law for the pursuers and allowed a proof.

Watson v.
Gibson & Co.
LdStormonth-Darling.

The admitted facts are that on the voyage in question the "Eildon" carried passengers as well as cargo, that she loaded at Leith, where she took on board part of her cargo and a number of passengers, that she proceeded in the first instance to Middlesborough to load further cargo there at Cochrane's Wharf and Dent's Wharf, but that the destination of the passengers and of the cargo was Dunkirk, none of the passengers having booked from Leith to Middlesborough, and that when the collision occurred she was in charge of a pilot licensed by the Tees Pilotage Commissioners, and was within the pilotage district over which their jurisdiction extends. The question turns on the true construction of section 604 (subsection 1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which is recited in its essential points in the Lord Ordinary's opinion. His Lordship has decided that the compulsory pilotage is, in the circumstances, a good defence, chiefly on the ground, apparently, that the opposite view would introduce additional anomalies into this code of legislation, although in the earlier part of his opinion his Lordship says that he has "nothing to do with the anomalies of legislation, except in so far as they may have a possible bearing on interpretation." I regret to be unable to agree with this view. I prefer to follow the kind of construction adopted by Lord Halsbury when dealing with a different phrase in the same statute in the case of *The "Rutland."*¹ There the House of Lords had to construe the meaning of "Ships trading from any port in Great Britain within the London district to any port in Europe north and east of Brest," and it was argued that a ship laden with a cargo from the River Plate to Rotterdam, and with cattle for London, was not "trading" from London to Rotterdam, within the meaning of the statute, when she had discharged the cattle in London and was proceeding on her voyage from London to Rotterdam, without having taken in any fresh cargo in London. Lord Halsbury held that it was a very forced construction to "subdivide minutely" the act of trading into each particular thing that was being done, and he rejected the argument that the word "trading" must mean carrying goods from each port of departure to each port of arrival. The judgment was unanimous.

Now, applying the principle of reading words in a statute according to their ordinary and natural import (which Lord Watson, in the same case, laid down as the proper principle to apply), I ask what is the ordinary and natural import of the words "every ship carrying passengers between any place in the British Islands and any other place so situate"? Besides the statutory definition of "Passenger" as including "any person carried in a ship other than the master and crew, and the owner, his family and servants" (section 267 of the Act of 1894), we have the decision of the Privy Council in the case of *The "Lion"*² that the payment of a fare is necessary to constitute a passenger within the meaning of the Compulsory Pilotage July 7, 1908. sections of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, which are practically the same as in the later Act of 1894, and therefore that where certain persons were on board a vessel by invitation from the captain without the privity of the owners, but these persons had not paid, or agreed to pay, any fare before a collision took place, they were not passengers within the meaning of the Act, so as to exonerate the owners from the damage occasioned by the pilot's default (section 633, Merchant Shipping Act, 1894). I deduce from this that to make a man a passenger you must have a contract with the owners, made before the collision takes place. Then comes the statute, which speaks of "passengers between any place in the British Islands and any other place so situate"; so it is not passengers in general, but a particular class of passengers that are intended—passengers, that is to say, "between" two places, each in the British Islands. Can that in the ordinary use of language mean anything else than the place of departure and the place of arrival? And if the place of arrival be not a place in the British Islands, but a foreign port, can section 604 apply at all? There may be no breach of contract in carrying the passenger to any number of ports in Britain so long as he knows and agrees to the terms of the contract, but can he whose ultimate destination is a port in France be said to be a passenger between two places in Britain? Even if it were possible to get over that primary difficulty, is it possible to "subdivide minutely" (to use Lord Halsbury's expression in the case of *The "Rutland"*¹) the description of the passage from Leith to Dunkirk, so as to describe it first as a passage from Leith to Middlesborough, and then as a passage from Middlesborough to Dunkirk? But it seems to me that the idea of compulsory pilotage, as applying to the River Tees in a voyage where there were no passengers except to a foreign port, is excluded by the plain words of section 604 (1) of the statute, and that this view is enough for the decision of the case.

LORD LOW.—If the collision between the "Eildon" and the "Hebe" had occurred after the former had entered the Tees, but before she arrived at Middlesborough, I should have agreed with the Lord Ordinary, and as your Lordships are of a different opinion, I shall state shortly the grounds upon which I would have done so.

The provisions of section 604 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, are intended for the protection of passengers, and, in my humble opinion, the construction which your Lordships put upon the enactment would, to a large extent, defeat its object. If there had been a single passenger to Middlesborough on board the "Eildon" upon the voyage in question, and if, as I am now assuming, the collision had occurred before the "Eildon" arrived at Middlesborough, I do not think it could be disputed that it would have been compulsory upon the master to take a pilot on board when he entered the Tees. But (according to the view taken by your Lordships, if I rightly understand it) because that single passenger was awaiting, all the passengers were deprived of the security which the employment of a pilot is supposed to give, and which the statute intended that they should have.

July 7, 1908. A construction of the enactment which would lead to such a result does not commend itself to my mind as likely to have been what the Legislature intended, and I should not be prepared to adopt it unless the language used, when fairly read, admitted of no other construction.

Watson v. Gibson & Co.
Lord Low.

The words requiring to be construed are "every ship carrying passengers between any place in the British Islands and any other place so situate."

Now, the "Eildon" was undoubtedly carrying passengers, and therefore the question is narrowed to this, whether she was carrying them between two places in the British Islands? It would, I suppose, be conceded that Leith is a place and that Middlesborough is a place within the meaning of the enactment. Therefore when the accident occurred (upon the assumption I am making) the "Eildon" was "carrying passengers," and, as matter of fact, she was carrying them "between" two "places" in the British Islands. If the statute had said from a place in the British Islands to any other place so situate, there would have been more difficulty, because the words "from" and "to" would have suggested, on the one hand, the place of embarkation, and on the other the destination of the passengers. I think that the word "between" was used for the very purpose of excluding that idea, and that the true construction of the enactment is that when a ship is carrying passengers, and is in fact carrying them between two places in the British Islands, even although their voyage may have commenced before the first place was reached and may be prolonged beyond the second place, it is compulsory for the master to take a pilot while navigating within the limits of any district for which pilots are licensed.

But then when the collision happened the "Eildon" was not in fact carrying passengers between Leith and Middlesborough, because she had already arrived at Middlesborough, and any passengers for Middlesborough would in ordinary course have left the ship before the collision took place. The question remains whether Cochrane's Wharf and Dent's Wharf, both at Middlesborough, are separate places within the meaning of the enactment. I am of opinion that they are not. Looking to the context and the purpose of the enactment, I think "place" means a place where passengers are taken on board and disembarked. In that sense Middlesborough is a place, but different wharves at Middlesborough are not places, and when the "Eildon" was shifting from one wharf to another at Middlesborough for convenience in loading cargo, she was not, in my opinion, carrying passengers between places in the British Islands within the meaning of the enactment. If her destination, after leaving Middlesborough, had been another port in the British Islands, the question might not have been so clear, because it might have been contended that she had completed her voyage to Middlesborough and had commenced her voyage to that other port. Any such argument is, however, excluded by the fact that her next port of call was Dunkirk.

I therefore agree with your Lordship that, upon the defenders' own statement, the defence of compulsory pilotage is not open to them.

LORD ARDWALL.—(After the narrative quoted supra)—The defenders state as a defence that at the time of the collision the "Eildon" was in charge of a pilot whose employment was compulsory. The Lord Ordinary has held that it was. Against this judgment the pursuers have reclaimed, July 7, 1908. and accordingly the question submitted for determination at this stage of the case is whether it was compulsory on those in charge of the vessel ^{Watson v. Gibson & Co.} "Eildon" to employ a qualified pilot in the River Tees. Section 604, sub-^{Lord Ardwall.} section (1), of the Merchant Shipping Act provides as follows:—"The master of every ship carrying passengers between any place in the British Islands and any other place so situate shall, while navigating within the limits of any district for which pilots are licensed under this or any other Act, employ a qualified pilot . . . and if he fails to do so shall, for each offence, be liable to a fine not exceeding One hundred pounds." The question accordingly comes to be, was the "Eildon," when the collision occurred, carrying passengers between Leith and Middlesborough? or between Cochrane's Wharf, Middlesborough, and Dent's Wharf, Middlesborough? or between Leith and Dunkirk? If within the meaning of the Act either of the first two alternatives be answered affirmatively, then it would appear that the employment of a pilot at the place where the collision happened was compulsory. If the last alternative be answered in the affirmative and the other two in the negative, then such employment was not compulsory.

The first remark that occurs to me is that the clause must be read as a whole, and that the meaning which the words would naturally convey to any ordinary person must be regarded as their true meaning; the direction to employ a pilot was intended for masters of ships, and not for lawyers or logicians.

Now, when a ship is described as carrying passengers "between" one place and another, I take it that in ordinary language it is the termini of the passengers' journey or voyage that are designated and not any stopping places in the course of such journey. To illustrate my meaning, suppose that a person is travelling by the East Coast route from Edinburgh to London, he would in ordinary language be described as a passenger "between" Edinburgh and London, and although physically and in point of actual fact he was travelling for a part of the journey between Newcastle and York, it would not convey a true impression to say of such passenger during that stage of the journey that he was a passenger between Newcastle and York.

Similarly, if a ship is carrying passengers from Leith as one terminus to Dunkirk as the other terminus, I think the ship cannot, according to the ordinary use of language, be said to be carrying them to Middlesborough or to any other place either within or without the British Islands. Yet the Lord Ordinary has found that the "Eildon," with no passengers on board except those bound for Dunkirk, was carrying these passengers between Leith and Middlesborough within the meaning of the Act, though such passengers never landed at Middlesborough or ever left the ship till they reached Dunkirk. He does not seem to decide whether the ship at the time of the collision was carrying passengers from Leith to Middlesborough or not. It appears to me that in no view can it be predicated of the ship that at that time she was so engaged, because so far as Middlesborough was concerned, she was, on her reaching Cochrane's Wharf, an arrived ship, her voyage was over, and the passengers had reached their destination, so the only other alternative open which can justify the Lord Ordinary's conclusion

July 7, 1908. is that the "Eildon" at the time of the collision was carrying passengers Watson v. "between" (for that is the word used in the Act) Cochrane's Wharf and Gibson & Co. Dent's Wharf, both in Middlesborough. I must say I consider that to pre-Lord Ardwall. diccate this of the "Eildon" at that time is to talk something very like nonsense, and I am certain that such a description of the employment of the "Eildon" at the time of the collision would never have occurred to a shipmaster or anyone else. This is a highly penal clause of the Act, and if the "Eildon" had not employed a pilot and the master had been prosecuted for a fine of £100 on the ground that he had failed to employ a pilot while his ship was carrying passengers between Cochrane's Wharf and Dent's Wharf, these being "places" within the British Islands within the meaning of the statute, I think the prosecution would have been laughed out of Court.

The plain common-sense meaning of the clause is simply this, that ships carrying passengers from one British port to another British port are to employ pilots when navigating within the limits of any district for which pilots are licensed, whereas ships carrying passengers between a British port and a foreign port are not required to do so. The word "place" and not "port" is used, I suppose in order to cover places outside of as well as inside of ports, but that does not affect the general meaning. Port is said in the definition clause of the Act (section 742) to "include place," but there may be places where passengers are disembarked outside of a port and yet within the British Isles. I should suppose Iona is not a port, and yet thousands of passengers are landed there from steamships every year. I desire further to point out that the obvious and indeed the only sure test by which the master of any ship can determine whether his ship is in the ordinary meaning of the words "carrying passengers between any place in the British Islands and any other place so situate" is the destination of the passengers as entered in the ship's books or papers, and for their passage to which place they have paid the customary fares. In *The "Hanna"*¹ and *The "Lion,"*² payment of a fare was taken as the test of whether a person was or was not a "passenger" on board a ship within the meaning of the earlier shipping statutes, and I think that similarly the test of the place to which a ship is "carrying" any person is the place to which such person has paid his fare.

I am therefore of opinion that at the time the collision occurred the "Eildon" was not, according to the ordinary use of language or within the meaning of the statute, carrying passengers "between any place in the British Islands and any other place so situate," but was in the ordinary sense of the phrase carrying passengers between Leith and Dunkirk, and that accordingly it was not compulsory on the master to employ a pilot.
Lord Low supposed the case of the "Eildon" carrying one passenger to Middlesborough, and pointed out that it was hard that for want of that one passenger the others should be deprived of the safety afforded by the employment of a pilot. But the presence of that passenger would have altered the whole case and made the section applicable, with the result that the passengers to Dunkirk would have obtained a protection which under July 7, 1908. the statute they were not entitled to.

I am accordingly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, the third plea in law for the pursuers sustained, and the second plea in law for the defenders repelled, and that quoad ultra the parties should be allowed a proof of their averments, and the pursuers a conjunct probation.

Giertsen v.
Turnbull &

Ship—Charter-Party—Time Charter—Warranty of Seaworthiness—Separate Voyages.—Under a time charter-party a steamer was hired by the owners to the charterers for a period of six months from September 1905, "she being then tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the service," the owners being bound to "provide and pay for the necessary equipment for the proper and efficient working of the said steamer, maintaining her in a thoroughly efficient state for and during the service."

On 28th November 1905 a breakdown of machinery occurred while the vessel was on a voyage from Jaffa to Valencia, necessitating her going to a port for repairs. This breakdown was due to defects which were in existence before the vessel left Jaffa on 20th November.

Held that the owners' obligation at common law and under the charter-party was to hand over the vessel in a seaworthy condition at the commencement of the hiring, and to maintain her in that condition by defraying whatever expenses were necessary for repairs; but that there was no warranty, either express or implied, that she should be seaworthy at the commencement of each particular voyage or stage of a voyage during the currency of the charter, so as to entitle the charterers on the ground of breach of implied warranty to refuse payment of the hire for the voyage between Jaffa and the place where the breakdown was remedied.

The "Vortigern," [1899], P. 140, distinguished.

Ship—Charter-Party—Breakdown of Machinery—Date of Commencement.—A time charter-party provided "that in the event of loss of time from . . . breakdown of machinery . . . the payment of hire shall cease from the time the breakdown occurred until" the vessel "be again in an efficient state to resume her service."

In the course of a voyage the vessel left a port with defects in her machinery which at first did not impede her progress, but which gradually became more serious, and ultimately necessitated her going to a harbour for repairs.

Held that the breakdown occurred at the point of time when the defects

July 9, 1908. became so serious as to render it necessary, in the opinion of a prudent navigator, that she should proceed to a harbour for repairs.

Giertsen v.

Ship—Charter-Party—Breakdown—Off Hire—Liability for coals consumed during off hire.—A clause in a time charter-party provided that the charterers of the vessel should pay for the coals used during the currency of the charter. The charter-party expressly provided that the payment of hire should cease during breakdowns.

Held that the charterers were bound to pay for the coals used during periods of breakdown.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Salvesen.

IN July 1905 Mathilde Giertsen, Bergen, and others, owners of the s.s. "Bauta," of Bergen, chartered her to George V. Turnbull & Company, Leith, for a period of six calendar months from September 1905.

At the conclusion of the period of hire the parties differed as to the amount due under the charter-party, and in consequence two actions were raised by the owners against the charterers, and a cross action by the charterers against the owners. These actions were conjoined.

The charter-party provided, inter alia, as follows:—"That the owners agree to let, and the charterers agree to hire, the said steamship or vessel for the term of six calendar months; commencing from the 1/30th September 1905 . . . she being then tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the service . . . on the following conditions:—(1) That the owners shall provide and pay for all provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew; and shall pay for the insurance on the vessel, and for all necessary stores . . . and provide and pay for the necessary equipment for the proper and efficient working of the said steamer, maintaining her in a thoroughly efficient state for and during the service. (2) That the charterers shall provide and pay for all the coals, fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, and all other charges and expenses whatsoever. (3) That the charterers shall accept and pay for all coals in ship's bunkers on delivery; and the owners shall on the expiry of this charter-party pay for all coals then left in the bunkers, at current market prices in both cases. (4) That the charterers shall pay for the use and hire of the said vessel at the rate of £270 sterling per calendar month. . . . (9) That the captain, although appointed by the owners, shall follow the instruction of the charterers, who will furnish him from time to time with the necessary sailing directions. . . . (12) That in the event of the loss of time from a deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four running hours, the payment of hire shall cease from the time the breakdown, &c., occurred, until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the vessel be driven into port, or to anchorage, by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers' risk and expense. Charterers to have the option of adding such time off hire to the period stipulated for under this charter. . . . (22) Average, if any, according to York and Antwerp Rules, 1890. . . . (26) Penalty for non-performance of this charter, proved amount of damages. . . ."

"These actions all arise out of a charter-party which was entered into between the owners of the 'Bauta' and a firm of shipping agents in Leith. The charter-party is dated 26th July 1905, and was for a period of six calendar months commencing on 23d September of that July 9, 1908. year. The sums sued for by the owners represent certain deductions which the charterers made when settling for the hire of the vessel during the time that she was actually employed. The charterers, on the other hand, maintain that they were entitled to make larger deductions than they have actually done, and in the counter action at their instance they sue for repetition of sums paid amounting in cumulo to about £200. Some of the deductions which are in dispute represent comparatively small amounts, and these the parties have arranged extrajudicially. The controversy has accordingly been substantially narrowed to this—for what periods were the charterers exempt from payment of hire during the currency of the charter-party, in respect of certain breakdowns of machinery which occurred on three separate occasions, and which for the time being prevented the working of the vessel? The clause in the charter-party which regulates this matter is expressed in the following terms :—(His Lordship quoted clause 12). On the construction of this clause as applicable to the facts in the case the controversy turns.

“The evidence with regard to the first breakdown is as follows :—On the 14th of November, while the ‘Bauta’ was on a voyage to Jaffa in ballast to load a cargo of oranges there, the master, who was on deck, heard a peculiar sound, which is entered by the first mate in the log-book as a violent shock in the engine-room. The captain now explains that this language does not accurately express what actually took place, and that the noise in fact was such that it did not attract the attention of any of the other persons who were on deck. It was, however, an unusual sound; and although the captain does not now profess to know what caused it, he at one time attributed it to the propeller having struck some wreckage, although the evidence now led for the ship suggests that it may have been one of the knocking sounds which are a common result of some temporary derangement in the machinery. The experts examined were agreed that such noises are attributable to a variety of causes, such as the slackening of bolts, or the presence of water in the cylinders, or the like. As the steamer, however, was able thereafter to maintain her ordinary speed, the captain did not attach so much importance to the occurrence as he was inclined to do at the time. The entries in the log shew that on the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th of November the steamer was able to make, on an average, about 8 knots an hour; and indeed occasionally the speed rose to 8½ and even to 9 knots under favourable conditions. At 10.40 P.M. on the 17th the vessel arrived at Jaffa, and next day she commenced to take in her cargo of oranges. In the mate’s log there is no further reference to the noises in the engine-room, or to anything which could give rise to any uneasiness.

“In the engineer’s log, which was kept by the first engineer, the witness Henrikssen, the entry with regard to the same matter is in the following terms :—‘At 8 P.M. a strange noise was heard in engine-room; the steam pressure was then 140 lbs. As the fires were being cleaned at the time the place whence the sound came could not be located. As the steam pressure rose rapidly the sound disappeared, and the engines were kept working under full steam pressure.’ There are no remarks with reference to the 15th, 16th, or 17th of November, but on the 18th of November the engineer notes, ‘On arrival at Jaffa the strange sound aforementioned was again heard, but during the

Turabull &
Co.

Giertsen v.
Turnbull &

manceuvring nothing was heard.' The engineer, however, deponed that when the pressure got low he had heard a knocking sound, the cause of which he was unable to explain, from time to time during the period between the 14th of November and the arrival of the ship at Jaffa.

" At Jaffa the engineer made as thorough an examination of the engines as was possible under the circumstances. Jaffa is an open roadstead, and accordingly steam required to be kept up on the boilers during the whole period of loading, and I think it is proved that it would have been unsafe to have tilted the vessel so as to have made a thorough examination of the propeller and propeller shaft possible. The engineer, however, rowed round the vessel in a boat, and he also took hold of the propeller with his hand to ascertain whether it was loose. The captain also made an inspection of the ship from a boat, but did not handle the propeller or shaft. Nothing was found to be wrong with the machinery except that two bolts at the couplings which support the propeller shaft were found to be out of order, the one being broken and the other slack. These were put right, and it was hoped that thereby a recurrence of the knocking sound would be prevented. Up to that point I think the master and engineer did all that was reasonable; and I reject the view that they ought to have called a survey by engineers of other vessels, or to have gone to Port Said. The defect, whatever it was, was quite obscure; and there was no reason to apprehend at that time that it would interfere with the working of the vessel.

" The 'Bauta' left Jaffa at 7 P.M. on 20th November on a voyage to Valencia. About an hour after departure (as the engineer notes in his log) 'the strange sound was again heard somewhat more pronounced when steam went down a little, but on the steam pressure going up the sound disappeared.' On the 21st the sound was again heard all through the twenty-four hours every time the pressure went below 150 lbs., and was observed to grow worse; and the same remark is made with regard to the 22d. On the 23d, at 1.30 A.M., the engines were stopped to examine the pumps to ascertain if the sound might originate there. A coupling bolt was then found to be out of order, and a new one was put in. At 8.40 A.M. the engines were again started, but without any improvement. On the 24th the strange sound from the engines became more observable, but no special flaw could be detected. On the 25th, as the sound became worse, it was decided to take out the piston rods, and at 8.30 A.M. the engines were stopped and all the three piston rods were examined, but were found to be in order. On the 26th the vessel apparently proceeded under full speed and steady high pressure. On the 27th the thumping noise became more pronounced and sharper, and there was great vibration in the engines when the shocks occurred, and for the first time the engineer seems to have thought that the propeller must be loose on the shaft, and that this was the cause of the persistent noise. At 8.30 on the morning of the 28th the engines were stopped in order that a new bolt might be put in the crank-shaft; and while the ship was stopped an examination was made of the propeller of a similar kind to that made at Jaffa, with the result that the engineer reached the conclusion that the propeller was loose on the shaft. The engineer then apprised the master of his discovery, and it was resolved to make for the nearest port, which happened to be Bona, under slow speed, so as not to make the damage worse.

This was accordingly done, and by midnight on the 30th the vessel July 9, 1908. was moored in Bona harbour. It was there ascertained that the shafting had got out of line, and that the white metal stern-bush had been worn down to a dangerous extent. According to the experts, the gradual wearing away of the bush was sufficient to account for the knocking sound which had continued at intervals since the 14th of November. The vessel had to lie at Bona until her machinery was again in an efficient condition, and in the meantime the cargo of oranges had to be transhipped and forwarded by another vessel." (His Lordship also stated the facts as to two other breakdowns, with which this report is not concerned.)

On these facts the charterers ultimately maintained that their liability to pay hire ceased upon the date of the commencement of the voyage from Jaffa and lasted until the "Bauta" was again seaworthy, whereas the owners dated the period of non-hire from 28th November, the date at which the vessel abandoned her voyage and made for Bona. With regard to the cost of coals consumed during the period off hire, the charterers contended that during the off hire period the owners were bound to pay for the coals consumed, whereas the owners maintained that the charterers were liable.

By interlocutor, dated 20th March 1907, the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) found that the period for which the charterers were exempted from payment of hire began at 8.30 A.M. on 28th November 1905.*

* "OPINION.—(After the narrative quoted supra)—The owners of the 'Bauta' contend that it is only from the time that the vessel arrived at Bona until she was again efficient that no hire is due. The charterers, on the other hand, maintain that the breakdown must be held to have commenced on 14th November, and that, from that time, the hire ceased to be payable. In their action, however, they do not insist upon this extreme contention, and, indeed, there was no evidence whatever that the defect—assuming it to have commenced on the 14th—caused any loss of time until much later. Accordingly, their main contention was that, as from the time that the vessel left Jaffa, she was not, by reason of the defects which afterwards developed so as to cause a breakdown, in full working order, and that, as this caused a loss of time exceeding twenty-four running hours, the hire must be held to cease from the time the breakdown occurred.

"In my opinion, this construction of the clause is unsound. The words 'a breakdown of machinery' must be construed in a popular and reasonable sense, and I do not think that the ordinary commercial man would say that the machinery had broken down because there was a defect in the machinery which did not interfere with the ordinary working of the ship, although an ultimate breakdown was attributable to that defect. In many cases it would be impossible, e.g., where breakdowns arise through parts of the machinery gradually wearing out, to say when the defect commenced, and it would be most unsettling to business if a construction of a common clause in a commercial contract were to be adopted which would necessarily raise endless controversies. The vessel here was able to steam at her full speed for seven days after the alleged breakdown, because I think the small progress that she made on the 24th, 25th, and 26th November is sufficiently accounted for (apart from the occasional stoppage of the engines for purposes of examination) by the strong head winds and high seas which she encountered. Even on the 27th November she was able to cover practically her ordinary day's journey, and it was only after 8.30 A.M. on the 28th that the speed was greatly reduced in consequence of the discovery which was then made. If she had, in the meantime, reached Valencia, I presume the charterers' argument would have been just the same, although, in point

Turnbull &
Co.

By interlocutor, dated 18th July 1907, the Lord Ordinary found that the owners were entitled to payment for the coal consumed during the time when the vessel was broken down.*

The charterers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) They were not bound to pay any hire after the commencement of the voyage from Jaffa, and the date of the commencement of the voyage was the date at which loading began, viz., 18th November.¹ This was clear upon two distinct grounds. (a) In the first place, the owners' obligation, both at common law and under the charter-party, and particularly clause 1 thereof, was to provide a ship in seaworthy condition at the commencement of each voyage which she might undertake during the period of hire;² of fact, there would never have been a day during which a reasonable amount of work in their service was not done. It is not to be left out of view that the charterers themselves at first were prepared to pay, and in fact did pay, the hire up to the 25th of November, notwithstanding that they had at that time before them both of the ship's logs, which contained all the evidence upon which they now rely. I also reject the shipowners' construction of the clause in question. They contended that the breakdown did not take place until the vessel arrived at Bona, and that, up to that time, it could not be said that a breakdown had occurred 'preventing the working of the vessel,' as she, in fact, proceeded to Bona under her own steam. In my opinion, in a commercial sense, the vessel broke down whenever the defect was discovered which rendered it necessary, in the opinion of a prudent navigator, that she should proceed to a harbour for repairs. She was not the less broken down that she was able to proceed, under her own steam at half speed, than if she had employed a tug, or had managed to reach port under sail. This view appears to be in accordance with the decision in the case of Hogarth, 18 R. (H. L.) 10, where the breakdown was held to date from the time that the high-pressure engines broke down, although the vessel was able to reach a port under her low-pressure engines. . . ."

* "OPINION.—The question is whether, during the period when, according to my previous judgment, payment of hire ceased, the coals consumed on board the 'Bauta' fall to be charged against the shipowners or the charterers. The latter contended that it was inequitable that during the time when they were deriving no benefit from the ship, they should nevertheless be liable for the cost of the coal used to enable the vessel to steam to a port of safety from the spot where the actual breakdown took place. In my opinion, the decision of this question depends not on general considerations of equity, but on the terms of the charter-party. By article 2 the defenders were taken bound to provide and pay for all the coals, fuel, &c., used during its currency. But for the stipulation contained in article 12, they would also have been liable to pay the hire, for the misfortunes of a ship under a time charter primarily affect the charterer. It does not, however, follow that because they have stipulated that the hire shall cease from the time a breakdown occurs, the other expenses for which they are liable shall also cease to run, and the implication from the stipulation in Article 12 points in the contrary direction. There is no express decision on this matter; but the dictum of Mr Justice Phillimore in Vogemann, 6 C. C. 253, accords with my own opinion. I hold that the general obligation on the charterer to provide and pay for coals is not subject to any implied limitation during the time that the vessel is broken down. . . ."

and each separate stage of each voyage.¹ Upon the facts it was July 9, 1908. clear that the vessel was not seaworthy when she left Jaffa. The owners, accordingly, had not fulfilled their part of the contract, and were accordingly precluded from insisting on payment of hire.² (b) In the second place, clause 12 provided that hire was to cease from the time of the occurrence of a breakdown. The breakdown occurred, if not earlier, at any rate at Jaffa, that being the place at which the vessel became inefficient for the special service contemplated, which was the true test of a breakdown.³ To deny that a vessel was broken down, on the ground that she was not wholly incapable of making progress, was contrary alike to common sense and law, and to make the matter depend upon the opinion of the captain, as the Lord Ordinary had done, was to make a question of fact, in which two parties were deeply interested, depend upon the judgment and courage of an individual, who was, in all probability, unknown to the parties when they made their contract. (2) They were not liable to pay for coals used during the breakdown. This was clear from clause 12. There it was provided that detentions due to weather or accidents to cargo were to be at the expense of the charterers, from which it logically followed that detentions due to other causes were to be at the expense of the owners. Further, the last sentence of clause 12 shewed that the period of breakdown was to be treated as a complete hiatus, and that the charterers could add it on at the end of the period of hire. Accordingly, if the owners' view as to coals was sound, the result would be that for the period in question the charterers would be paying twice for coals. Clause 22, which imported the York and Antwerp Rules, 1890, was also in their favour. Rule 9, in calculating general average, debited the shipowner with the estimated cost of coals where cargo and stores had been burned in time of peril. On any view, the question depended on the terms of the charter-party, and, accordingly, the case of Vogemann v. Zanzibar Steamship Company, Limited,⁴ was not in point, the charter-party there being different.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The charterers were bound to pay hire down to the 28th of November, when the vessel had to abandon her voyage and make for Bona, that being the time at which the breakdown happened. The charterers' first contention, viz., that the owners were in breach of their obligations under the charter-party and at common law, and therefore could not demand hire, was radically unsound. The owners' obligation was to furnish a seaworthy vessel at the commencement of the period of hire,⁵ and to effect necessary repairs from time to time. They did not warrant the vessel sound at the commencement of each "stage" of the voyage. The doctrine of stages was inapplicable in the case of a time charter. The "Vortigern,"⁶ relied on by the charterers, related solely to seaworthiness in the limited matter of sufficiency of coal. Accordingly the fact that the vessel developed certain defects did not entitle the charterers to refuse to pay hire.¹ Their remedy, if they had one, lay in an action of damages on the ground that the vessel had not been repaired when she ought to have been repaired, or that the repairs had been inexpeditiously or inefficiently carried through.² There was no such case here. There was nothing visibly wrong with the vessel at Jaffa; at anyrate there was nothing to justify her in deviating from her voyage, and had she done so, the owners would have exposed themselves to the risk of an action of damages for improper deviation.³ Further, it was always necessary to prove that the unseaworthiness of the vessel had directly resulted in damages to the charterers,⁴ and this, as might easily be demonstrated, the charterers could not do. In any event, it would not be lightly presumed that the master was in error in his decision.⁵ The charterers' argument on clause 12 was also unsound. A vessel could not be described as broken down during a period in which she regularly accomplished her daily run. The breakdown did not occur until she became inefficient,⁶ and she was not inefficient until the 28th. (2) As regarded coals, it was clear that the charterers had to pay. Clause 12 made no reference to coals, and the case was indistinguishable from and ruled by Vogemann v. Zanzibar Steamship Company, Limited.⁷ Lastly, the charterers had barred themselves from contending that no hire was due for the period in dispute by claiming and recovering from the cargo owners in general average the amount due to them for the period in question. They had in fact themselves treated the period in question as one in which the vessel was on hire. They had accordingly suffered no loss from the breakdown, and were bound to pay the hire.

LORD ARDWALL.—The three actions now conjoined in which the interlocutors reclaimed against have been pronounced arose out of a charter-party of the vessel "Bauta" entered into between her owners, Mathilde Giertsen and others, and George V. Turnbull & Company, Leith, as charterers. The vessel was hired out for six calendar months beginning in September 1905, and it was stipulated that the charterers should pay for the use and hire of the said vessel at the rate of £270 sterling per calendar month.

The two questions which formed the subject of the discussion on the reclaiming note were, first, what was the period on the vessel's voyage from Jaffa to Bona during which the said vessel is to be regarded as off hire within the meaning of the 12th article of the charter-party, and second, whether the charterers were entitled to escape paying for the coals used during the time that the said vessel was off hire on the voyage from Jaffa to Bona?

The facts of the case are set forth with great clearness and correctness July 9, 1908. in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, and I require only to refer to them incidentally in connection with the contentions presented to us on behalf of the ^{Gierlsen v.}Turnbull & Co. charterers.

The Lord Ordinary has held that the period for which the vessel was off Lord Ardwall. hire on the voyage from Jaffa to Bona was from 8.30 A.M. on the 28th of November 1905 till 9 A.M. on the 1st of January 1906, the former date being the time when it was discovered that the propeller of the vessel was loose on the shaft. As a consequence of this discovery, the voyage on which the vessel then was from Jaffa to Valencia was interrupted, and the master resolved to make for the nearest port, which happened to be Bona, at slow speed. The vessel arrived at Bona by midnight on the 30th of November, and it was then ascertained that the shafting had got out of line and that the white metal stern-bush had been worn down to a dangerous extent. Consequently the vessel had to lie at Bona till her machinery was repaired.

It seems tolerably clear on the evidence that the accident which originally led to the propeller and shaft getting out of order was the propeller striking some wreckage on the 14th of November while the vessel was on her voyage to Jaffa. It was contended before the Lord Ordinary by the owners that they were entitled to hire until the time when the vessel arrived at Bona, but on the reclaiming note they acquiesced in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and I need say nothing more on that point than to refer to the Lord Ordinary's opinion regarding it, in which I concur.

The charterers, on the other hand, while they maintain that the breakdown must be held to have commenced on the 14th of November, yet only insist in their action on non-liability for hire from the time when the vessel left Jaffa, and they claim this exemption from hire on two grounds. In the first place, they plead that under the first clause of the charter-party the owners were bound under the clause of maintenance to have the vessel in a seaworthy condition at the commencement of each voyage that she might undertake, and that the "Banta" not having been seaworthy in the proper sense of the word at Jaffa, the owners thereby committed a breach of their contract, and cannot on their part claim remuneration in respect of the voyage from Jaffa to Bona. In support of this contention they relied upon the case of *The "Vortigern."*¹ That was a case in which a ship ran out of coal and was forced in consequence to burn fifty tons of cargo, the value of which the freighters successfully claimed to deduct from the amount of freight on the ground that the implied warranty of seaworthiness had been broken by the vessel not having a sufficient quantity of coal to continue her voyage. But it is plain from the opinions delivered in that case that it is only with reference to supplies of coal that a ship must be put in a seaworthy condition at the commencement of each stage of a voyage, because it is usual in long voyages that the vessel has leave to call at certain ports for the purpose of coaling, and accordingly the vessel must be made seaworthy at the commencement of each stage of the voyage, by being supplied with sufficient coal at starting, and if she is not so supplied, then the war-

July 9, 1908. ranty of seaworthiness is held, as in the case of *The "Vortigern,"*¹ not to have been complied with. But at the same time it is made plain in the judgment in that case, that except in such cases the warranty of seaworthiness is satisfied by a vessel being put in a seaworthy condition when starting on her voyage, or in the case of a vessel being hired when she is handed over to the charterers.

Giertsen v.
Turnbull &

Lord Ardwall.

I am accordingly of opinion that the charterers' contention on this point is ill-founded, that the implied warranty of seaworthiness was complied with when the vessel was handed over to the charterers in a seaworthy condition at the commencement of the period of hiring, and that the maintenance clause in article 1 of the charter-party is inserted merely for the purpose of laying upon the owners the burden and the expense of maintaining the vessel during the period of hire in a thoroughly efficient state, including of course the expense of all necessary and proper repairs. Therefore if the charterers had been at the expense of repairing the steamer at Jaffa or elsewhere, they would have recovered that expense under this clause, but there is nothing in it to suggest that the payment of hire is to cease merely because the vessel at some time during the currency of the time charter requires repairs to put her in a thoroughly efficient state.

The only article of the charter-party which deals with the cessation of payment of hire is article 12, and that article prescribes that the hire is to cease when, inter alia, there is a breakdown of machinery or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, and it is further provided that the payment of hire shall cease from the time "when the breakdown occurred until she be again in an efficient state to resume her services." On this clause the charterers maintained that in the present case the breakdown must be held to have occurred at Jaffa, because at that time the vessel was suffering from the defect in the machinery which led on the 28th of November to her discontinuing her voyage. They argued that to make the question of the occurrence of the breakdown depend merely upon the opinion of the master of the vessel on the question when it was prudent to discontinue the voyage, was to put the matter on a wrong basis, by making the time of the occurrence of the breakdown depend upon an opinion, and not, as they contended it ought to do, upon fact. They therefore maintained that, it being now ascertained by sufficient evidence that when at Jaffa the shaft and propeller of the vessel were in a condition to render her not fit for the voyage on which she was starting, the breakdown within the meaning of the charter-party must be held to have occurred at Jaffa.

On this question I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the words "a breakdown of machinery" must be construed in a popular and reasonable sense, and that in such sense the vessel broke down when a defect was discovered which rendered it necessary in the opinion of a prudent navigator that she should proceed to a harbour for repairs. This does not mean, as was suggested by counsel for the charterers, that the question of when there is a breakdown is made to depend entirely upon the opinion of the master. The master's opinion is, of course, of great value as a piece of evidence, but should it turn out that that opinion was wrong, it July 9, 1908. may be corrected by other evidence in any particular case. If the contention of the charterers were given effect to, it appears to me that it would put matters in a very uncertain and undesirable position as regards the application of a clause of this kind in a charter-party, because according to that contention not the time when a vessel has to go to a port for repairs is to be taken as the time of the breakdown, but the time when the defect in her machinery, which, when fully developed, ultimately led to her having to discontinue her voyage, can be ascertained or conjectured to have first come into being. It would be most undesirable that the liability or non-liability for hire of a vessel should be made to depend upon the result of investigations of the kind. Investigation, for instance, as to whether a hairy crack in some piece of the machinery was old or new? and if old, how old? and so on.

Therefore, in the present case I have no hesitation in holding that the breakdown did not occur on the 14th of November, when the original damage probably was done to the machinery or when the ship left Jaffa, but on the 28th of November, when, after having progressed so far upon her voyage perfectly satisfactorily as regarded speed and safety, it was discovered that the propeller was loose on the shaft, and that it was necessary to go to port for repairs.

The second question to be considered is whether during the period when payment of hire ceased, in terms of article 12 of the charter-party, the coals consumed on board the "Bauta" are to be paid for by the shipowners or the charterers. It was contended for the charterers that it was inequitable that they should be charged for the coal which was needed to enable the vessel, after the breakdown which occurred on the voyage, to proceed to port for repairs, and that it was a necessary corollary from the cessation of payment of hire that payment for coals should also cease over the same period. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this question must be determined on the terms of the charter-party and the nature of the contract.

Now, in a contract constituted by time charter, in the absence of special exemption, the charterers have to suffer the consequences of all mischances that may happen to the ship. In the present case there is a stipulation that in certain circumstances the hire shall cease, but there is no stipulation that the other expenses for which the charterers are liable shall also cease to run, and accordingly, there being nothing in the charter-party to exempt the charterers from payment of the charges for coal and other expenses mentioned in article 2 of the charter-party during the cessation of hire provided for by article 12, it follows that the general obligations contained in article 2 still rested upon the charterers notwithstanding the breakdown of the machinery. An opinion to this effect was, as noted by the Lord Ordinary, delivered by Mr Justice Phillimore in the case of Vogemann,¹ and this opinion was approved of by the Court of Appeal,² and although it was obiter as regarded the case then under discussion, yet it is entitled to great weight considering the eminence of the Judges who delivered it.

On the whole matter I entirely agree with the interlocutors of the Lord

Sleigh's
Factor.

Trust—Judicial Factor's firm acting as law-agents—Fees paid by borrowers of trust funds.—One of a firm of law-agents was appointed judicial factor on a trust-estate. He lent part of the factory funds on heritable security to clients of the firm. The usual fees were paid to the firm by the borrowers in accordance with the table of fees.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Guthrie) that the factor was not bound to communicate to the factory estate the fees paid by the borrowers to his firm.

Trust—Judicial Factor's firm acting as law-agents for beneficiaries.—A partner in a firm of law-agents, was appointed judicial factor on a trust-estate. The firm did legal work on the employment of the beneficiaries' guardians, and of the beneficiaries themselves after they had attained majority. The work was done in connection with the disbursement of the factory income to the beneficiaries, and also in connection with the preparation of deeds rendered necessary in consequence of certain beneficiaries having applied for an advance of capital. For these services the firm charged fees and commission against the beneficiaries.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Guthrie.

THE late James Hume Sleigh, sometime secretary and treasurer of the Bank of Bombay, died on 26th June 1899, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 30th October 1896, and a holograph codicil dated 1st January 1898.

By his trust-disposition and settlement the truster conveyed his whole estate to trustees, and directed that an equal share of the income of the residue should be paid to each of his three children, Edgar Hume Sleigh, Charles Hope Sleigh, and Marie Edgar Sleigh, the capital being settled for each child's issue. He also appointed his sister, Miss Jane Slight, and his brother-in-law, Dr Henry M. Church, guardians to his children.

The truster was survived by his three children, who were all in minority. Miss Slight and Dr Church accepted office as guardians.

The trustees appointed by the truster having declined to act, Alexander Yeaman, W.S., Edinburgh, was, on 4th November 1899, appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate.

On 22d January 1907 the beneficiaries under the trust presented a petition for recall of the appointment of the judicial factor, and for the appointment of new trustees. On 26th February 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) recalled the appointment of the judicial factor, and remitted to the Accountant of Court to examine his accounts.

Edgar Hume Sleigh, Charles Hope Sleigh, and Marie Edgar Sleigh, July 9, 1908.
lodged a note of objections to the factor's accounts, which stated, Sleigh v. inter alia :—(2) “ . . . The factor himself undertook the law-^{Sleigh's} agency business of the factory and continued to act as such agent ^{Judicial} until the recall of the factory under the firm name of Messrs Lindsay, ^{Factor.} Howe, & Company. The net factory estate amounts approximately to £47,700, of which the factor invested approximately the sum of £43,600 in heritable bonds. Of this sum over £20,000 has been lent to the clients of his own firm. All the said bonds were prepared in the name of Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company as agents for the factor, but the same were truly prepared by the factor himself. . . . The factor was paid in full for the realisation and reinvestment of the whole capital estate at the rate of 1 per cent, the total sum allowed to him therefor by the Accountant being £499, 12s. By thus acting in the name of his said firm the factor received an additional and illegal payment for his services qua factor. Moreover, the factory estate was thereby deprived of independent advice in connection with the investment of the said funds and the security arising therefrom. The factor is accordingly bound to communicate to the factory estate the fees thus obtained in the name of Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company in connection therewith. . . . (3) During the minority of the petitioners the income of the estate was alleged to be paid to Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company, who in turn, it is represented, paid it over to the guardians of the beneficiaries. For this service the said firm charged the sum of £34, 2s. 6d. in name of commission and £33, 16s. 6d. in name of business charges. Said disbursement of income in the name of Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company was truly made by the factor, who had received full payment otherwise for his trouble in collecting and disbursing the same. The Accountant of Court has fixed the factor's fee for said services at the rate of 4 per cent. . . . By making said additional charges through his firm the factor has received double remuneration for the work of the factory. . . . The factor is bound now to communicate to said estate the amounts of said commission and business charges. (4) After the petitioners came of age the factor under his firm name of Lindsay, Howe, & Company disbursed to them the sums to which they were entitled, and charged them with similar commission. The petitioners maintain that the charges which the factor is entitled to make in respect of his disbursement to them of the income of their respective shares of the estate are covered by the aforesaid percentage upon the income of the estate allowed by the Accountant of Court, and that he is bound to communicate to the portions of the factory estate respectively effeiring to the petitioners the sums so charged by him in name of commission. . . . (5) By holograph codicil appended to the last will and testament of the late James Hume Sleigh, it is provided that the sum of £2000 contained in a deposit-receipt of the National Bank of India, should in the event of the trustor's death ‘be the property of my children and administered as provided for in my last will and testament.’ The petitioners Edgar and Charles Sleigh requested out of the said sum payment of £300 to each. . . . In connection with the payment to them of the sums of £300 each, the factor represented to them that they had only a liferent in the said sum of £2000, and took bonds in security for the repayment thereof. Said bonds were alleged to be drawn by the said firm of Lindsay, Howe, & Company, but were in reality drawn by the factor. In any event, the factor being a partner of said firm is not entitled to make said charges through the said firm. . . . The factor is not entitled to credit therefor, and is bound to communicate the same to the factory estate."

The judicial factor lodged answers in which he stated, inter alia :—
“(2) No fees for law-agency have been charged against the factory. . . . The whole expenses . . . incurred in connection with the investment of the factory funds on the said heritable securities were paid by the borrowers against whom they were charged by Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company, who prepared the necessary security deeds, &c. No charge was made against the factory in connection therewith. . . . (3) The objectors' guardians, Miss Slight and Dr Church, appointed Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company to be their agents, who in that character performed certain services for which the ordinary professional charges were made.* Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company were not employed by the factor to do any work for the factory, and no charge against the factory was made by them. . . . (4) The charges referred to were not made in respect of any work pertaining to the factory, but, as the objectors are well aware, for the professional services outwith the factory altogether performed on their individual behalf and at their request. . . . (5) The objectors Edgar and Charles Sleigh having applied for an advance out of the factory estate the same was made by the factor. The necessary documents were prepared and charged for by Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company against them as individuals—no charge was made against the factory estate, and no fee was allowed to the factor by the Accountant for the realisation rendered necessary by the request.”

On a remit by the Lord Ordinary, the Accountant of Court reported, inter alia :—“(3, 4, and 5) That the late Mr Sleigh by will appointed guardians to his children, and Messrs Duncan Smith & MacLaren appear to have acted for them when the petition for a judicial factor was presented. Thereafter Messrs Lindsay, Howe, &

* The following letters written by Miss Slight and Dr Church were produced by the petitioners :—

Letter, Miss Jane H. Slight to Duncan MacLaren, Esq., S.S.C., dated 3d December 1907.—“Dear Sir,—In answer to your question as to the factorship on my late brother's estate, during the minority of my two nephews and niece, it was my impression that the appointment of factor embraced all the duties requiring to be discharged in connection with the estate, and that the appointment was made, not only to facilitate my duties as guardian, but also to avoid further expenses which would have been incurred by a law-agent.

“I was not aware, therefore, that Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company were employed separately as agents on the estate, as all my transactions were through the factor himself.”

Letter, Dr Henry M. Church to Charles H. Sleigh, Esq., dated 30th November 1907.—“ . . . I wish to say that I did not appoint Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company as law-agents on your behalf in connection with your late father's estate.”

The judicial factor produced a memorandum (No. 58 of process) sent by Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company to Miss Slight and Dr Church, asking their approval, as guardians, to arrangements the writers proposed for the children. On 10th February 1900 Miss Slight and Dr Church signed as approving.

They prepared annual accounts, which were submitted to and approved of by the guardians, and carried through the necessary discharges. The Accountant is of opinion that the factory had no connection with or interest in the charges for these operations. . . ."

On the 12th February 1908 the Lord Ordinary sustained the objections to the factor's accounts, and granted leave to reclaim.*

The judicial factor reclaimed.

Argued for the judicial factor;—(Obj. 2) A judicial factor might act as agent for the factory estate though he could not charge

* "OPINION.— . . . (Obj. 2) Stripped of specialties, the question in objections 2 to 5 is the same, namely, whether a judicial factor can retain sums paid to him or his firm for business done in connection with the trust. In dealing with the second objection the Accountant indicates his view that the principle, as derived from actual decision, is limited to this, that 'a factor cannot make profit at the expense of the estate.' If this be the extent of the principle, then the second objection would fall to be disallowed. But the principle is based on the view that the factor must not place himself in a position of double interest. His duty is to choose the best agents for the trust. His own firm may be the best, or they may not; his membership of the firm prevents his arriving at an independent and unprejudiced judgment on that question. If this be the foundation of the principle, then the application will strike at all cases of remunerative employment by the factor of his firm whether profit be made by him and his firm directly at the expense of the estate, or whether the profit comes directly from the borrowers from the estate, but all the same through the employment of the factor's firm by him. That view has been repeatedly laid down both in Scotland and England. It may be sufficient to refer to the judgment of Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst in New v. Jones, 1 Hall & Twells, p. 632 (quoted by the Lord Justice-Clerk Hope in the Whole Court case of Lord Gray and Others, 19 D., p. 1, at page 5), and Lord Chancellor Cranworth in Broughton v. Broughton, 1855, 5 De Gex, M. & G., p. 160 (also quoted by the Lord Justice-Clerk in Lord Gray's case, at page 9), and to the opinions in the same case of Lord Gray and in the subsequent case of Lauder v. Millars, 21 D. 1353. The result is thus stated by Lord Cranworth in Broughton:—"The rule applicable to the subject has been treated at the bar as if one sufficiently enunciated it by saying that a trustee shall not be able to make a profit of his trust; but that is not stating it so widely as it ought to be stated. The rule really is that no one who has a duty to perform shall place himself in a situation to have his interests conflicting with that duty, and a case for the application of the rule is that of a trustee himself doing acts which he might employ others to perform, and taking payment in some way for doing them."

"(Obj. 3) The principle deciding the second objection applies here, unless the factor could instruct his averment, contained in the answers, that his firm was employed, not by him, but independently by the objectors' guardians, Miss Slight and Dr Church. That, however, is denied by Miss Slight and Dr Church in the letters Nos. 42 and 41 of process. A proof on this point was not asked; and I therefore sustain this objection.

"(Objs. 4 and 5) These objections fall to be sustained, if my view is correct that it is illegal for a factor to make profit through his firm by the business of the trust. No evidence was tendered of any independent selection and employment of the factor's firm by the beneficiaries as individuals. This result cannot be affected by any view I may entertain of the shabbiness of the objections. In all calculations of interest I fix the rate at 4 per cent."

fees.¹ Here the fees were paid by the borrower, and did not come out of the factory estate. It followed that the factor was not bound to communicate the fees. A person occupying a fiduciary position was bound not to place himself in such a situation that his own interests might conflict with the interests of the trust. In the present case there was no possible conflict of interest. The factor was personally responsible for his intromissions, and was as much interested in getting the best possible investment as was the trust-estate. If the factor might be biassed in the selection of an investment he might equally be biassed in the selection of an agent. The fact that he was paid fees by the borrowers could not raise a conflict of interest. Again, where a trustee obtained a secret advantage out of the execution of the trust he was bound to communicate that advantage to the estate. That principle only applied if the advantage were obtained secretly.² In the present case the beneficiaries and their guardians were aware that the factor's firm were acting as agents, and must be taken to have known that the agents would be paid by the borrowers in accordance with the table of fees. *Broughton v. Broughton*³ was a case in which an executor-solicitor who had acted on behalf of the estate was held not entitled to charge fees, but only out of pocket costs. The fees disallowed would have come out of the estate. It was to that class of case alone that Lord Cranworth's dictum applied. *Keech v. Sandford*⁴ was an old case, and the facts were very dissimilar to those of the present case. (Objs. 3, 4, and 5) These objections related to charges for work done on the employment of the guardians or of the beneficiaries after they came of age. The charges were made not against the estate but against the beneficiaries personally. The beneficiaries and their guardians were entitled to employ the factor, and the factor was not bound to communicate the fees. These objections, therefore, should be repelled.

Argued for the petitioners;—A trustee was not entitled to make any profit out of the execution of the trust other than that which was properly incidental to his office.⁵ If a judicial factor chose to act as agent for the factory the utmost he could charge was out of pocket costs.⁶ No distinction could be drawn between the factor and his firm, or between work done as factor and work done as agent. What was prohibited was making a profit out of the execution of the trust. It was immaterial whether the profit came out of the estate or not, but in the present case it did come out of the estate in this sense, that the factor's fee, to which all other profits made by him out of his office must be imputed, came out of the estate. Again, a trustee was bound not to place himself in such a position that his own interests might conflict with the interests of the trust.⁷ In the present case there was a conflict of interest. It was the interest of the factor to July 9, 1908. lend the funds to the clients of his own firm. It was the interest of the borrower to get as low a rate of interest as possible, and it was the interest of the factory to get a high rate of interest. Further, it was the duty of the factor to supervise the agent of the factory.¹ If he employed his own firm he put it out of his power to perform that duty. (Objs. 3, 4, and 5) The general principle that a trustee was not entitled to make a profit out of the execution of the trust applied to these objections. There was no independent employment either by the beneficiaries or their guardians. Accordingly these objections should be sustained.

At advising on 9th July 1908,—

LORD LOW.—The judicial factor in this case is a partner of the firm of Lindsay, Howe, & Company, W.S., and it appears that part of the trust funds was invested by him upon heritable securities, the borrowers being clients of his firm. Perhaps I should explain that it was only one-half of the amount invested upon heritable securities which was lent to clients of Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company. The fees received by the firm for the professional services rendered by them in carrying through these transactions amount to £295, 17s., and the contention of the beneficiaries under the trust is that that sum must be credited to the trust-estate. The answer made by the judicial factor to that claim is that the whole of these fees were paid by the borrowers, against whom they were charged by Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company, in accordance with the recognised practice in Scotland. The Lord Ordinary has, however, given effect to the claim of the beneficiaries.

There are two well-established principles of trust law, both of which are said to be applicable to this case. The one is that a trustee must not make profit from the execution of his office (a rule which, of course, does not apply to the remuneration of a judicial factor for work done qua judicial factor); and the other principle is that a trustee cannot be allowed to place himself in a position in which his interest as an individual conflicts, or may conflict, with his duty as a trustee.

The Lord Ordinary's opinion is that both of these principles have been infringed in this case, and that accordingly the judicial factor is bound to communicate to the trust-estate the profit which he has made, through his firm, by acting as agent both for the borrower and the lender in carrying through the transactions to which I have referred. Now, if the fees received by the firm had been charged against and paid by the trust-estate, I imagine that the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's view could not be impugned. But no part of the fees was, or could have been, charged against the trust-estate, because they were earned by and paid to the judicial factor (through his firm) not as judicial factor, or as acting as law-agent for the trust, but as law-agent for the borrowers. I know of no authority for saying that the judicial factor is bound to credit these fees to the trust-estate. All the cases, so far as I know, in which a person in a position of trust has been held bound to communicate profit which he has made to the

Lord Low. trust-estate have been cases in which that profit has been earned either directly or indirectly out of, or at the risk of, the trust-estate. Thus, if a trustee chooses to do professional work for the trust, which he would have been entitled to employ another professional man to do, he cannot claim remuneration from the trust-estate, but only actual outlays. Again, if a trustee receives a commission from a person dealing with the trust, he must communicate the benefit to the trust-estate; and if he trades with trust funds, the profits belong to the trust-estate.

Such cases are familiar, and the law in regard to them is well settled, but there is no case, so far as I know, in which the Court has compelled a trustee to communicate to the trust-estate remuneration for professional services rendered to a third party, such remuneration being wholly paid by the third party, and to no extent, either directly or indirectly, coming out of the trust-estate. I am therefore of opinion that the rule that a trustee must not make profit from the execution of his office does not apply to this case, because in my opinion he has not done so in any reasonable sense.

In regard to the rule that a trustee must not enter into a transaction in which his duty as a trustee comes in conflict with his interests as an individual, the penalty for infringing the rule is that the transaction will not be enforceable against the beneficiaries, and may be set aside at their instance, while if loss to the trust-estate results, the trustee will be liable to make it good. Thus in Aberdeen Railway Company v. Blaikie Brothers,¹ where a director of a railway company contracted to supply certain material to the company, it was held by the House of Lords that he could not enforce the contract; and in the *York Buildings Company v. Mackenzie*² the purchase by the common agent in a ranking and sale of part of an estate sold by public roup was reduced by the House of Lords many years after the transaction and although the purchase was made in complete good faith.

In this case the sufficiency of the securities is not challenged. It is not suggested that the investments were not sound trust investments, or that the securities were other than ample. If the beneficiaries had been seeking to have the investments set aside on the ground that the judicial factor lent trust funds to his own clients and acted as law-agent for both parties, it may be that the Court would, without inquiring into the sufficiency of the securities, have ordained the factor to restore the money to the trust-estate, he receiving an assignation to the securities. But there being no suggestion that the transactions should be set aside, I can find neither authority nor principle for imposing a fine upon the factor—because it really comes to that—to the amount of the remuneration which he received from the borrowers for professional services rendered to them alone.

The result is that in my opinion the Lord Ordinary was wrong in sustaining the second objection. In taking this view, however, I differ from the Lord Ordinary only upon the question of remedy, and I am not to be taken as dissenting from the opinion which he indicates that in lending trust funds to his own clients the judicial factor placed himself in a position in which his interest as an individual might possibly conflict with his duty as a trustee. July 9, 1908.

The third and fourth objections to the factor's accounts have also been sustained by the Lord Ordinary. They arise in this way—By his will the late Mr Sleigh directed his trustees (in whose place the judicial factor stands) to divide the income of the trust-estate among his children, and to hold the capital for their issue. He also appointed guardians to his children. So long as the children were in minority the free income was paid by the factor to their guardians, and when they came of age it was paid to them. Lindsay, Howe, & Company acted as law-agents first for the guardians and afterwards for the children when they came of age, and the account to which the third objection refers is an account rendered by the firm to the guardians for professional services rendered in receiving payment of the income from the factor and thereafter administering it as agents for the guardians. The account to which the fourth objection refers is a similar account rendered to the children after they came of age. The Lord Ordinary has held that Lindsay, Howe, & Company are not entitled to claim payment of the charges contained in either of these accounts, on the ground that they represent charges for professional work done by the factor through his firm in connection with the trust. I am unable to assent to that view. The judicial factor's duties were ended when he paid the income to the guardians or the beneficiaries as the case might be, and if the latter chose to employ Lindsay, Howe, & Company to act as their law-agents in ingathering and administering the income for them, I see no reason why the firm should not have undertaken the employment and made the usual professional charges for their services.

Sleight's
Lord Low.

The Lord Ordinary refers to two letters, Nos. 41 and 42 of process. The former is written by Dr Church, one of the guardians, to one of the beneficiaries saying "I did not appoint Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company as law-agents on your behalf in connection with your late father's estate." No. 42 of process is a letter by the other guardian, Miss Slight, to Mr Duncan MacLaren, S.S.C., in which she says that her impression was that the factor's appointment "embraced all the duties requiring to be discharged in connection with the estate," and that she was, therefore, not aware that Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company were employed separately as agents on the estate.

It is to be observed that these letters were addressed to third parties, and there is nothing to shew that they were ever communicated to the factor or his firm, and in the objections there is no suggestion that the firm were not authorised to act as law-agents for the guardians and for the children after they came of age. If there had been a specific averment to the effect, inquiry might have been necessary, but in the absence of any such averment, or any motion for inquiry, I am not prepared to give any weight whatever to the letters Nos. 41 and 42 of process.

The objection which is stated to the accounts is that the services which are charged for were services which it was the duty of the factor to perform and which were covered by his factor's fee. As I have already said, I do not think that that is an objection which can be sustained to the effect of holding that no part of the accounts can be charged against the guardians

July 9, 1908. or the beneficiaries. The accounts might indeed have contained certain charges which fell to be struck out on the ground that they represented services truly rendered to the trust and not to the guardians or the beneficiaries, or that they represented work which fell to be performed by the factor, and was covered by his fee. Such charges, however, would raise questions of audit merely, and not questions of principle to be determined by the Court. As therefore the accounts have been examined by the Accountant of Court, and he has reported that they are in order, I am of opinion that objections 3 and 4, and objection 5, which is in a similar position, as well as objection 2, should be repelled.

Sleigh's Judicial
Lord Low.

LORD ARDWALL.—It is settled law that neither a trustee nor a judicial factor is entitled to obtain remuneration out of the trust funds for agency business performed by him for the trust under his charge. The leading Scotch case is that of Lord Gray and Others,¹ decided by the whole Court on 12th November 1856. The principle upon which this rule is based undoubtedly is that the trustee or factor must not place himself in a position where he has or may have a double interest to serve, namely, his own interest and the interest of the estate; and in order to discourage persons in such fiduciary positions from doing business for the estate under their charge, the law has said that although it is not illegal for them to do so, yet they shall not get any remuneration for so doing, but shall only be entitled to recover cash outlays which they have made (see Gray,¹ supra). But it has never, so far as I can find from any cases quoted during the argument, been laid down that a trustee or factor must not only forego any remuneration from the trust, but must communicate to the trust any profit which he has in any way made arising out of his position as trustee or factor.

The cases of *Robertson v. Morrison*² and Lauder v. Millar,³ the case of *Gray*¹ above quoted, and Broughton v. Broughton,⁴ were all cases where a person in a fiduciary position was claiming to recover payment of accounts for business done in connection with the trust out of the trust-estate, and therefore I think the closing words of Lord Cranworth's dictum in Broughton,⁴ quoted by the Lord Ordinary, were not intended to apply to any other kind of case than that then under consideration.

The ground stated by Lord Cranworth as the foundation of the rule in such cases is as follows:—He says,—“It has often been argued that a sufficient check is afforded by the power of taxing the charges, and the answer to this is that the check is not enough, and the creator of the trust has a right to have that and also the check of the trustee. The result therefore is that no person in whom fiduciary duties are vested shall make a profit off them by employing himself, because in doing so he cannot perform one part of his trust, namely, that of seeing that no improper charges are made.”

In the present case, as I shall presently point out, this ground of the rule has no application, nor has the only penalty that has hitherto been imposed upon law-agents doing work for the estate on which they are trustees or factors any application in the present case, because that penalty

any remuneration for the work done.

The present case arises out of the circumstance that the factor through his own firm obtained suitable investments upon heritable security for the funds of the factory estate. According to the rule in the table of fees the expense of such an investment falls entirely upon the borrower. It is the borrower therefore in this case who has the interest to see that no improper charges are made, and not the factor, because qua factor he has no interest to protect, inasmuch as the estate is not liable for any charges whatever, be they proper or improper. He is accordingly not in the position of having a divided duty, first to the estate and then to himself, so far as these charges are concerned. Further, I see no equitable grounds for holding that these fees, paid as they are by the borrower, should be credited to the trust-estate. It has been suggested that the factor's fee covers all work done for the estate or in connection with it, and that therefore these charges paid by the borrower should be applied to reimburse the estate pro tanto for the factor's fee. I think it is a sufficient answer to this to say that the work of drawing or revising the deeds necessary to carry out a loan upon heritable security is not work in the contemplation of parties in calculating a factor's fee, but is entirely extra work so far as the duties of the factor are concerned. It is true some suggestions were made on behalf of the respondents to the effect that to allow trustees or factors to lend money through the firm of law-agents to which they belong might have the result of raising a conflict of interests in which the factor might be tempted to accept unsatisfactory securities out of favour to his own firm or his own clients; but if he were to do so, the remedy would be to reduce the transaction and claim damages from the trustee. I therefore do not think suggestions such as this can be held to affect the matter. It has often been said that it is undesirable that an agent should act both for the borrower and the lender in any case, and this so far is true, but the Courts have never held that such an arrangement is illegal, although they have frequently said that in such transactions agents must be particularly careful in carrying them through, otherwise they will be liable to actions of reduction and damages at the instance of one or other of their clients.

Sleigh v.
Sleigh's Judicial Factor.

Lord Ardwall.

Some minor suggestions were also thrown out, but I consider that they are too remote possibilities to take into consideration in this matter, and on the whole I am unable to find authority or principle for the proposition that a factor or trustee ought to be penalised for carrying out loan transactions through his own firm by having to pay into the trust-estate fees received from the borrower, which never belonged to the trust, and to which, so far as I can see, the trust has no legal or equitable right.

The Lord Ordinary has sustained objections 3, 4, and 5 on the same general ground on which he has sustained objection 2, namely, that they relate to accounts which the firm of Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company, of which the factor is a partner, charged against certain beneficiaries of the trust-estate or their guardians; that accordingly these accounts must also be regarded as an attempt to make profit out of the estate under the factor's charge; and that therefore the accounts must be disallowed except in so far as they consist of outlays. This matter has been decided without a proof, but if it were necessary a proof might be allowed in order to prove or disprove the allegation that these accounts are not accounts belonging to the trust at all, but are, as they bear to be, accounts incurred by the beneficiaries under the trust, or their guardians, after these parties had received payment out of the trust of the sums due to them from time to time. It was said that these beneficiaries and guardians never knew that Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company were acting for them, and supposed all along that the work now charged for was being done by or on behalf of the factor. All I can say is that if they thought this they were certainly mistaken, but the fact that they were mistaken will not disentitle Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company from recovering these charges unless it can be shewn that they had no right to make them in respect that they did not do the work. I think that the memorandum No. 58 of process and docquets appended thereto clearly shew that the guardians, at all events Miss Slight and Dr Church, knew perfectly well that Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company were taking charge of their interests, and that they approved of their doing so, while the accounts themselves shew that all the charges made are not charged, as is suggested, against the trust-estate, but against the sums received by the guardians or their agents from the judicial factor on the trust-estate after such sums had been received. It is of course open to the guardians of the children to have these accounts taxed, but, when that has been done, I can see no good reason for their resisting payment.

Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company were legally just as much entitled to act for these guardians and beneficiaries as they would have been entitled to act for any other person who happened to have an interest in this trust with regard to moneys which had ceased to be in the trust and had been paid over to the beneficiaries. At the same time I do not think that Messrs Lindsay, Howe, & Company ought to have undertaken the business in question, because these guardians and beneficiaries were, properly speaking, the clients of Messrs Duncan Smith & MacLaren, and the factor's firm ought not to have interfered with them.

I am accordingly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled in so far as it sustains the objections 2, 3, 4, and 5, that these objections should be repelled, and the case remitted to the Lord Ordinary for further procedure.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree entirely in the opinions which have been given. There can be no doubt that a trust-estate in the hands of a trustee or judicial factor must be watchfully guarded against any attempt of the person in a fiduciary position to make profit out of the estate in his hands, and the Courts have always been strict in enforcing the rule against such action. But, on the other hand, where as here the things done by the factor were—as they certainly were—for the benefit of the estate in the ordinary course of business, there is no illegality in the fact that the judicial factor, being one of a firm of law-agents, received with the firm the fees which the borrowers were liable to pay, and which they did pay, for the legal work done in the business of drawing up and having completed the documents necessary to secure the loans, which was not work falling in any case to be done by the factor himself.

Further, I agree that, when funds were handed over to the minors' guar- July 9, 1908.

 tation against the heritors, in which he craved for an augmentation of seven chalders. The stipend had been fixed at eighteen chalders in 1849, and from that date till the present application no augmentation had been asked for. The heritors lodged in process a minute unanimously consenting to the augmentation craved. It was stated that the present minister's predecessor, who had held the benefice for fifty-free teind was stated to amount to £120.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an unusual demand, and under ordinary circumstances I do not think this Court would be prepared to grant it. But the circumstances here are peculiar. There has been no modification of this stipend since 1849, and there is a complete concurrence on the part of all the heritors in the augmentation asked for. They no doubt take the view that the present low figure at which the stipend stands is due to the per-lived a long time, and they feel that it is right that the benefice should not

On 13th January 1908 Mrs Kate Thomson or Scott raised an action of divorce for desertion against her husband, Andrew Scott, then an inmate in Buckinghamshire County Lunatic Asylum, Stone, near Aylesbury.

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) appointed a curator ad litem to the defender.

The following pleas in law were, inter alia, stated on behalf of the defender :—(1) The action is incompetent and ought to be dismissed, in respect that the defender is now insane. (2) The action is irrelevant and ought to be dismissed, in respect that the defender has not been in wilful and malicious desertion since he became insane as condescended on.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case to the Second Division.*

* In reporting the case the Lord Ordinary said :—"This is an action of divorce on the ground of desertion brought by a wife against her husband.

"According to the pursuer's averments the material dates are as follows :—The parties were married in 1894, and the defender left the pursuer in November of that year. In January 1895 he stayed two days in the pursuer's parents' house when she was there. On 15th March 1899 he was admitted to Hampstead Workhouse suffering from influenza, with fever and delirium tending to become maniacal. On 10th April 1899 he was sent to Hanwell Asylum, and was transferred to the Buckinghamshire County Asylum on 9th December 1904, where he was at the date of the raising of the action. The pursuer avers that it is not expected he will ever recover.

"A curator ad litem has been appointed to the defender. It was contended by him that in the circumstances above set forth the action is incompetent or irrelevant, in respect the defender has not been in wilful and malicious desertion since he became insane. The pursuer's contention is that as the defender was, according to her averments, in wilful and malicious desertion for four years before he became insane, the supervening insanity is no bar to her obtaining decree of divorce.

"The difficulty arises from the fact that it has never been settled since the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861, at what date the right to make a bona fide offer to adhere expires. Under the old law an offer of adherence, when made timeously and bona fide, was sufficient to bar divorce—Fraser on Husband and Wife, p. 1214. At p. 115 of Lothian's Consistorial Law the view is expressed that the last opportunity for offering to adhere is the interval between the charge on the decree of adherence or admonition by the Church Court, where such is given, and the raising of the action of divorce. In M'Lauchlan v. M'Lauchlan, 1 D. 294, it was held Argued for the defender ;—The action was incompetent and should be dismissed, seeing that the defender was now insane and could not therefore be held to be in desertion. The conditions under which divorce on the ground of desertion might be obtained were set forth in the Act 1573, cap. 55. That Act was merely declaratory of the consistorial law of the Reformation. Under that law great importance was attached in actions of divorce to the citation of the defender, and this necessarily postulated, as a preliminary to divorce, that the defender should be able to appear and defend the case.¹ Citation was also considered of importance in the Roman Dutch Law,² and in the modern law of South Africa.³ The terms of the Act 1573, cap. 55, which required, among other preliminaries, that there should be an action of adherence and decree for adherence, shewed that any circumstance which was a reasonable cause for non-adherence would be a good defence to an action of divorce on the ground of desertion.

that the pursuer could not be barred from obtaining decree of divorce by the defender offering to adhere after the four years had expired and all the preliminary proceedings required by the Act of 1573 had been taken. If proceedings had been instituted under the old law as it existed prior to the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861, the first step would have been to bring an action of adherence. If this had not been brought before the defender had become insane, it is difficult to see how the pursuer could have obtained a decree ordaining a person of unsound mind to adhere. Accordingly, in the present case, unless a decree of adherence had been obtained by April 1899, it could not have been obtained at all, and the subsequent action of divorce could not have been proceeded with.

“ The Conjugal Rights Amendment Act of 1861 has, however, made a change on the Act of 1573, for it provides that it ‘shall not be necessary prior to any action for divorce to institute against the defender any action of adherence, nor to charge the defender to adhere to the pursuer, nor to denounce the defender, nor to apply to the presbytery of the bounds, or any other judicature, to admonish the defender to adhere.’ The effect of this is explained by the Lord President in Watson v. Watson, 17 R. 736. The abolition of the forms required by the Act 1573 as necessary preliminaries to the action of divorce did not in any way alter the substantial conditions on which alone divorce could be obtained. The argument for the curator ad litem was that there was no vested right to divorce on the expiry of the four years during which malicious and obstinate desertion had continued. He founded on the case of Auld v. Auld, 12 R. 36, in which the Lord President and Lord Shand, referring to the cases of Winchcombe, 8 R. 726, and Muir, 6 R. 1353, criticised the view that as a result of the 11th section of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act the whole procedure formerly necessary is to be held to have taken place the moment the action is raised, and that therefore an offer to adhere after the summons has been served comes too late. The case of Hunter v. Hunter, 2 F. 771, was also founded on. In M’Callum, 3 Macph. 550, Lord Deas expressed the opinion that the meaning of section 11 of the Act of 1861 is that if there shall have been non-adherence for the statutory period, decree of divorce may be obtained by simply instituting and following out the action of divorce itself.

July 11, 1908. This was the effect of the statute as determined by the decisions of the Court and the alteration in the law made by the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, merely simplified the procedure, and did not affect the substance of the law.¹ In this case the defender being insane could not be called on to adhere, and, as, therefore, he was not in non-adherence at the date when the action was brought, the pursuer could not obtain divorce. The case of *M'Lauchlan v. M'Lauchlan*² was distinguished by the fact that there the offer to adhere was made only after the action had been raised.

Scott v. Scott.

Argued for the pursuer;—The law of divorce for desertion was founded on the Act 1573, cap. 55, and therefore it was immaterial to inquire as to the prior law of this country or as to other systems of law. That statute required, as a preliminary, an action of adherence, but that action might be brought after one year's desertion,³ and the pursuer could, after obtaining decree, bring an action of divorce on

In the case of Mackenzie, 22 R. (H. L.) 32, Lord Watson says,—‘The only remedy provided by Scotch law where the offending spouse persists in avoiding cohabitation after decree is to be found in the Act of 1573. Decree of divorce under that Act is, in my opinion, nothing else than a penalty for obstinate non-adherence.’ And in dealing with the Conjugal Rights Act it is pointed out that the object of that enactment was to simplify procedure by allowing the pursuer to prove non-adherence in his suit for divorce.

“If insanity, just as imprisonment, be a reasonable cause for non-adherence, the question is whether it cannot be pleaded as an answer to an action of divorce for desertion.

“If it can be so pleaded, it may entail great hardship upon a pursuer. There may have been malicious and obstinate desertion for the statutory period. Under the old law an action of adherence might have been raised after a year. Under the existing law the action of divorce, in which non-adherence must be proved, can only be raised after the four years. If insanity supervenes shortly after the expiry of four years, the pursuer, according to the defender's argument, might under the existing law be in a worse position than before 1861, and might lose her remedy altogether.

“I think it is possible to hold that, on the facts as averred, the present action is competent and relevant, and I am accordingly of opinion that a proof should be allowed. So long as the substantial conditions, to use the expression of the Lord President in Watson's case, are observed, the injured spouse is entitled to the statutory remedy. The substantial conditions could not be fulfilled in Auld or in Hunter, because the adultery of the pursuer was a reasonable cause for non-adherence on the part of the defender at the date of the action. So if insanity had here supervened before the four years of desertion had expired, the action could not have been maintained. Where, however, as here, there had been four years' desertion prior to insanity, it appears to me that the defender had incurred the statutory penalty. It is not necessary to express an opinion on the question whether it is too late, after the action has been brought, for the defender to offer to adhere. There can be here no offer to adhere on the expiry of the four years of desertion. Accordingly, the pursuer here might have obtained decree in an action of adherence brought while the defender was sane, and could then have proceeded afterwards with the action of divorce. The Act of 1861 merely simplified procedure, and did not otherwise affect the right of the injured party to obtain divorce. It had been settled that where one spouse was in desertion for four years there was a jus quæsitum in the injured spouse to insist for divorce.¹ That right might be defeated by the subsequent misconduct of the injured spouse, the principle in such cases being that the party was personally barred from obtaining redress.² An offer of adherence after the expiry of the four years was too late.³ But the effect of the insanity of the defender was nothing more than to make it impossible for him to offer to adhere, and as an offer to adhere made at any date after the insanity began would have been ineffectual, the fact that the defender was insane could not defeat the pursuer's right to divorce. Assuming, however, that the pursuer's action could now be met by an offer of adherence, no offer had been made. Insanity was not equivalent to an offer to adhere, and it could not be assumed that the defender, if he recovered, would be willing to adhere.⁴

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—This action of divorce for desertion has been reported to this Division by Lord Mackenzie on the question whether an offer to adhere can competently be made by or on behalf of a husband after the lapse of the four years which are necessary to lay the foundation for such an action, the question not being one of willingness to adhere if he could, but of impossibility of adherence owing to his supervening insanity. It is admitted that the marriage took place on 28th March 1894, and it is averred by the wife, who is pursuer, that in November 1894 the defender left the house where he and she had resided with her parents without giving any reason, and that he has never, with the exception of two days in January 1895, lived with the pursuer since that time, or contributed anything towards the support of her or the child of the marriage, who was born in July 1894. The curator ad litem appointed to the defender in the process states that, owing to the insanity of the defender, he is not in a position to ascertain the facts as to these averments; but he admits that the defender became an inmate of Hampstead Workhouse, suffering from influenza with fever and delirium tending to become maniacal, on 15th March 1899, and that he was transferred to Hanwell Asylum on 10th April in that year, since which time he has been continuously in an asylum, and is not expected the part of the defender. As, however, it may be considered that the case touches the general question of when an offer to adhere may be made, upon which different views have been expressed in the cases of Muir and Winchcombe, and the case of Auld, I think it proper to report the point."

 Scott v. Scott. 15th March 1899 it has been impossible for the defender to adhere to his wife.

The Lord Ordinary expresses the opinion that, 'on the facts as averred, the present action is competent and relevant, and that a proof should be allowed, because here there had been four years' desertion prior to insanity, and the defender had incurred the statutory penalty for that conjugal misconduct. His Lordship thinks it unnecessary to express an opinion on the question whether it is too late, after the action has been brought, for the defender to offer to adhere, because there can be here no offer to adhere on the part of the defender; but he reports the case, as it may be considered that it touches the general question of when an offer to adhere may be made—a question 'upon which different judicial views have been expressed in the cases of *Muir*¹ and *Winchcombe*² on the one hand, and *Auld*³ on the other.

I doubt whether there was any such real difference of judicial view as the Lord Ordinary indicates. In Muir's case¹ the husband's offer to adhere, after the action of divorce had been personally intimated to him, was held to come too late, chiefly on the strength of section 11 of the Conjugal Rights Act of 1861, and the wife, who was pursuer, and had established desertion for upwards of four years, got her divorce. Winchcombe's case² was one where a wife also got her divorce simply on the ground that the husband had deserted her for more than four years, and that there was no proof of his having made, after the expiry of the period, such an offer of adherence as she was bound to accept. Now, it is quite true that in Auld's case³ Lord President Inglis declined to accept what he characterised as the Lord Justice-Clerk's obiter dictum about the effect of section 11 of the Act of 1861 as finally settling the law. In particular, his Lordship combated the view for which the pursuer in Auld's case³ was attempting to use Lord Moncreiff's dictum, viz., that the lapse of four years gave a vested right to a deserted spouse to obtain divorce which could not be defeated by anything which happened after that period. And what had happened in Auld's case¹ after the lapse of the four years was that, by her own admission, the wife who complained of having been deserted had borne an illegitimate child. I greatly doubt whether Lord Moncreiff ever intended his dictum to be stretched so far as that, but, at all events, the pursuer's counsel here did not carry it to that extent, or anything like it. He fully admitted, with Lord President Inglis, that the changes introduced by section 11 of the Conjugal Rights Act, were changes in the form of procedure merely, and could not affect what the same learned Judge called "the substance of the enactments previously in force relating to this branch of the law of divorce"; and one of these substantial conditions was, of course, that the deserted spouse should not by her own conduct have disentitled herself from obtaining the remedy she sought.

But if the judgment that we are now to pronounce is to have any useful effect, such as the Lord Ordinary obviously intended by making the action at this stage the subject of a report, it will not do to restrict it to a mere criticism of the cases of Muir,¹ Winchcombe,² and Auld.³ Three other cases July 11, 1908. at least must be dealt with—those of M'Lauchlan,⁴ M'Callum,⁵ and Scott v. Scott.

Watson.⁶

M'Lauchlan's case⁴ depended in the Outer-House before Lord Fullerton, and began with the wife obtaining decree of adherence, upon which she gave a charge to the defender, her husband, which was disobeyed. He was denounced, and the denunciation was recorded. She then presented a petition to the presbytery to proceed to the admonition and excommunication of her husband. Finally she raised an action of divorce, in which the defender stated that he was ready and willing to adhere, and the pursuer met that with the plea that it was incompetent and irrelevant to make such an offer at that stage. Lord Fullerton repelled this plea of the pursuer, and appointed her to state in a minute, signed by herself, whether she accepted or declined the offer made by the defender. Lord Fullerton's interlocutor was, however, recalled by the First Division, consisting of the first Lord Mackenzie, Lord Corehouse, and Lord Gillies, very much on the strength of a passage in Baron Hume's lectures. Lord Mackenzie said that it did not appear to him to admit of doubt that, when desertion had been obstinately continued so long as it had been in that case (upwards of four years before the wife obtained her decree of adherence), there was a jus quæsitum in the party deserted to insist for a divorce which was not liable to be thereafter defeated at the option of the deserter. Lord Corehouse said that the statute gave the remedy for four years "malicious and obstinate desertion," which remedy was meant to be effectual. He also pointed out, like Lord Mackenzie, that unless the deserted spouse acquired a right to obtain a divorce after the lapse of four years such as could not be defeated by a subsequent tender of adherence, the remedy of the statute would be quite inoperative. And Lord Gillies agreed, on the assumption (which all the Judges made) that the pursuer's proceedings, ecclesiastical and civil, had been regular.

M'Callum's case⁵ was an action of divorce on the ground of desertion, and the judgment in it was pronounced soon after the passing of the Conjugal Rights Act, which by section 11 rendered it unnecessary, prior to any action for divorce, to institute against the defender any action of adherence, or to charge the defender to adhere to the pursuer, or to denounce the defender, or to apply to the presbytery of the bounds, or any other judicature, to admonish the defender to adhere. Excommunication not being expressly abolished by section 11, the case was reported by the Lord Ordinary (Lord Ormidale), on the question whether wilful desertion for four years together was a sufficient ground for divorce. The First Division unanimously held that, when admonition was dispensed with, excommunication as a necessary consequence was dispensed with also, and accordingly it was remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause.

Watson's case⁶ followed in 1890, and was sent to the whole Court. It was proved that in 1874 the wife left her husband, and had persisted in her desertion ever since. Her husband deponed that he was willing to take

July 11, 1908. her back, but she was not called as a witness, and it did not appear that any remonstrance had been made to her, although she was living in Scotland, and her address was known to the pursuer. The whole Court, by a majority, holding that the facts proved were not sufficient to warrant decree of divorce, remitted the case to the Lord Ordinary to take further proof, particularly with regard to the state of mind of the pursuer towards his wife during the period of desertion, and as to her willingness to return to him during that period. This case, therefore, seems to shew that in the opinion of the majority the necessity of admonition or remonstrance on the part of the spouse complaining of desertion was a question of circumstances depending upon the merits of the particular case, and that no absolute rule could be laid down. Perhaps the case is chiefly important for a vigorous protest by Lord President Inglis against the notion of introducing, or even seeming to countenance, divorce a vinculo by consent of parties.

It seems, therefore, to be the result of all the cases that when, as here, there has been "malicious and obstinate defection of the parties offender" for the full statutory period of four years, the injured spouse being all that time willing to adhere, and not being disentitled by any conjugal misconduct of her own from seeking the remedy of divorce, that is by itself a sufficient cause of divorce, whether it be called a vested right or a jus quæsitum to apply for the remedy. I am accordingly of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that the proof which he proposes should be allowed.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT remitted to the Lord Ordinary, instructing him to find the libel relevant, and to fix a diet for proof.

M. v. H.

M., Pursuer (Respondent).—Watt, K.C.—Spens.
H., Defender (Reclaimer).—Morison, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Reparation—Slander—Judicial Slander—Averments regarding co-defender in divorce action—Privilege—Malice—Sufficiency of averments of malice.—In an action of divorce for adultery brought by a husband against his wife, the wife's alleged paramour was called as co-defender. The husband founded on a written confession by the wife admitting that she had miscondacted herself with the co-defender, and averred:—"In consequence of the information elicited by the pursuer from the defender, the pursuer has made inquiries and has ascertained, and now avers, that" upon certain dates "the defender miscondacted herself with the co-defender, and that the co-defender is the father of the child which was born to the defender." The Lord Ordinary granted decree of divorce against the wife, but assoilzied the co-defender with expenses.

Thereafter the co-defender brought an action against the husband for reparation for the slander contained in the statements in the divorce action. He averred that these statements were made falsely, calumniously, and maliciously, and without probable or any cause. That no inquiries had been made by the husband or on his behalf relative to the co-defender's conduct, and that no evidence was attempted to be led at the trial against July 11, 1908. him. That the wife had been induced by the husband to write the alleged confession and that the husband knew that that confession was untrue. M. v. H.

Held that this being a case of judicial slander it was necessary for the pursuer to set forth facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred—that the pursuer had failed to set forth facts from which it could be inferred that the defender's statements in his action of divorce, which were relevant, were made from a malicious motive—and therefore that the present action was irrelevant, and the defender was entitled to absolvitor.

Scott v. Turnbull, July 18, 1884, 11 R. 1131, approved and followed.

Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., Nov. 16, 1886, 14 R. 75; and Beaton v. Ivory, July 19, 1887, 14 R. 1057, commented on and explained.

ON 12th June 1908, M. brought an action in the Court of Session 1ST DIVISION. against H. concluding for £500 as damages for an alleged slander. Ld. Johnston.

The pursuer averred that he had formerly been in the service of the defender, his duties being to look after a pony and the garden attached to the house. He further averred:—

(Cond. 3) "On 21st January 1907 the defender raised an action in the Court of Session against his wife, concluding for divorce on the ground of the adultery of his wife with the pursuer or some other male person to defender unknown. In said action the pursuer was called as co-defender, and the defender averred on record that 'In consequence of the information elicited by the pursuer from the defender, the pursuer has made inquiries and has ascertained, and now avers, that upon Tuesday, 1st May 1906, and upon other dates during that month, and also in the month of April preceding, the defender (Mrs H.) misconducted herself with the co-defender (pursuer), and that the co-defender is the father of the child which was born to the defender (Mrs H.) on or about 11th January 1907.' These statements are false and calumnious, and were made by the present defender recklessly, maliciously, and without probable or any cause. No inquiries whatever were made by the present defender, or on his behalf, relative to the pursuer's connection with the case, and the only communication he caused to be made to the present pursuer was in December 1906, when he endeavoured, through a private detective, to induce the pursuer to sign a similar confession to corroborate the said alleged confession by Mrs H. This the present pursuer refused to do. Further, the present defender never had any information connecting the present pursuer with his wife's alleged adultery, except a statement in one of the two documents referred to below, which document the present defender knew at the time he took the oath of calumny his wife was repudiating as false. Further, no evidence was attempted to be led at the trial against the pursuer."

(Cond. 4) "In said action the defender produced and founded on written statements alleged to have been addressed to him by his wife on or about 23d September 1906, and bearing to contain, inter alia, the following statement:—'I, Bella H., confesses to having on May 1st fallen pregnant with William M.' This was all that connected the present pursuer with the alleged adultery in this document. The other statement contained no mention of the present pursuer. With reference to defender's explanations in answer, it is averred that he knew perfectly well that his wife's condition might be due to himself."

M. v. H.

(Cond. 5) "The said Mrs H., in her pleadings in said action, denied that she ever had been guilty of adultery with the pursuer, and averred that the said letter or confession founded on by the defender was untrue, and written solely on the suggestion and at the instigation of the defender, and merely for the purpose of obtaining his consent to a separation. In point of fact the defender knew that there was no truth whatever in said alleged confession, and the same was suggested by him and written at his instigation with a view to obtaining a separation, which, at the time, both spouses desired. Notwithstanding the defender's said knowledge, and the fact that his wife in said action denied adultery with the present pursuer, and explained the circumstances in which the said alleged confession was written, the defender persisted in his allegations against the present pursuer, and took upon himself the burden of proving the said statements made by him on record, and adopted same as his own. By the judgment of the Court the pursuer was assoilzied from the conclusions of said action in so far as same were directed against him, and was found entitled to expenses against the defender."

(Cond. 6) "The foresaid statements were made by the defender of and concerning the pursuer falsely, calumniously, and maliciously, and were made without probable or any cause, and were admitted by him to have been so made when examined as a witness in the said action. At 1st May 1906 the pursuer was a boy of seventeen years of age, and was employed in a menial capacity in defender's service, and the foresaid statements made by defender concerning him were known by defender to be untrue, and they were made by defender recklessly, and in the knowledge that the said confession had been repudiated by his wife. There had never been the slightest familiarity, much less impropriety, between the pursuer and the defender's wife. Moreover, the defender persisted in said statements after his wife had stated on record the circumstances in which the so-called confession had been granted as aforesaid. Further, the defender knew that the child with which he charged the pursuer with being the father had been born on 11th January 1907, and was a child which had the full period of gestation, and that his said wife had been absent in England from 5th to 25th April 1906, during which period intercourse between pursuer and her had been impossible."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(3) The defamatory statements complained of having been made maliciously and without probable cause, the defender is not protected by privilege from responsibility therefor.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action, which should accordingly be dismissed. (2) The statements complained of being privileged, and the defender having acted without malice, is entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

On 6th June 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the first plea in law for the defender, and approving an issue for the trial of the cause.*

* "OPINION.—In this action, although as originally stated I do not think there was a relevant case set forth for the pursuer, I think that his amendments render it such that I must send it to trial. The circumstances are that the defender raised an action against his wife some eighteen months ago for divorce, and called as co-defender the pursuer in the present action,

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First July 11, 1908. Division on 11th July 1908.

Argued for defender and reclamer ;—The pursuer had averred no relevant case. The statement complained of being made in the course of judicial proceedings was privileged, and was only actionable on the ground of malice. Further, being relevant to the issue in dispute in the action in which it was made, facts and circumstances must be set forth from which malice could be inferred.¹ No such facts and circumstances had been set forth here. The confession of a wife was highly relevant to an action for divorce, and there were no facts and circumstances averred from which it could be inferred that the accusation against the co-defender implied in that confession was brought forward for the secondary purpose of injuring him, or for any other motive than the perfectly legitimate motive of assisting the case of the pursuer in the divorce action.

M. v. H.

who was then in the position of his groom. He raised that action, as stated in the record in the present action as amended, basing it upon a written confession under the hand of his wife. It is now said that in the divorce action the present pursuer 'was called as co-defender, and defender averred on record that—"In consequence of the information elicited by the pursuer from the defender"' (the defender in the passage I am reading means the wife and the pursuer means the husband) "'the pursuer has made inquiries, and has ascertained, and now avers, that upon Tuesday, 1st May 1906, and upon other dates during that month, and also in the month of April preceding, the defender misconducted herself with the co-defender, and that the co-defender is the father of the child which was born to the defender on or about 11th January 1907.'" As originally stated, the first part of that passage was not quoted, and the first part of that passage is what, I think, makes the amended record relevant, because it says—"In consequence of the information elicited by the' present defender from his wife, he 'has made inquiries, and has ascertained and now avers' definite facts.

"It is alleged now that no such inquiries were in fact made, that the husband ascertained nothing, and founded this averment of a specific act of adultery, and of intercourse continuing over two months, upon absolutely nothing but his wife's letter. That is the averment. It may be true or it may not. The statement to which I refer is, 'This' (referring to the letter of confession) 'was all that connected the present pursuer with the alleged adultery in this document. The other statement contained no mention of the present pursuer. These statements are false and calumnious, and were made by the present defender recklessly, maliciously, and without probable or any cause. No inquiries whatever were made by the present defender, or on his behalf, relative to the pursuer's connection with the case, and the only communication he caused to be made to the present pursuer was in December 1906, when he endeavoured, through a private detective, to induce the pursuer to sign a similar confession to corroborate the said alleged confession by Mrs H. This the present pursuer refused to do. Further, the present defender never had any information connecting the present pursuer with his wife's alleged adultery, except a statement in one of the two documents referred to below, which document the present defender knew at the time he took the oath of calumny his wife was repudiating as false. Further, no evidence was attempted to be led at the trial against the pursuer.'

"The result of the trial was that the Lord Ordinary, while finding that

July 11, 1908. Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—Facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred were duly set forth here. The averments were that the husband had made no inquiries, and had received no information in corroboration of his accusation against the co-defender. He based that accusation solely on the alleged confession, and yet he had recklessly, and without probable cause, persisted in that accusation after the wife had repudiated the confession, and when he had no evidence to lead in support of it. These facts and circumstances were sufficient to infer legal malice.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I confess that I think that this is an exceedingly clear case. I have nothing to add on the general law to what was laid down long ago by Lord President Inglis in Scott v. Turnbull,¹ and I venture to think that his Lordship's exposition of the law in that case is the law of Scotland, there was enough in the conduct of the wife corroborative of her written confession to justify his granting decree of divorce, held that there was no evidence against the co-defender, and accordingly he was assoilzied. Now, the contention before me has been that there is no relevant averment of facts and circumstances from which malice can be inferred. It is quite true that in the case of Scott v. Turnbull, 11 R. 1131, the Court laid down what had been fully recognised before—but they laid it down authoritatively—that in a case of judicial slander where the statement is relevant to the action—and some Judges think even where it is irrelevant, but at the same time pertinent—the pursuer must not merely aver malice, but he must aver a state of circumstances from which malice may be deduced; that it is not sufficient to use the adjectives 'false,' 'malicious,' and so on, but that there must be circumstances stated from which the malice may be deduced. The Lord President Inglis puts it thus in the case referred to:—'In order to displace the honest and proper motive of the defender and to shew that the statement was made from an improper motive, I think there must be a statement of facts and circumstances from which malice can be inferred.' That is certainly the law, but it is stated, I think, very widely, and it is to be read in connection with the circumstances of each case. And, a very few years afterwards, in the case of Gordon v. The British and Foreign Metaline Company, in 14 R. 75, there is a very important criticism and explanation by the Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff of the case of Scott v. Turnbull. He says,—'Now, at this point I should wish to say a few words on the case of Scott v. Turnbull, in 11 R. 1131, and the general principle which that case involved. The objection here is that the mere allegation of malice, without a specification of the facts which would imply malice and would lead the jury to come to the conclusion that it existed, is fatal to the action. Now, I entirely agree in the view that was taken in the case of Scott v. Turnbull. Malice is in the breast of the party accused, and it cannot be known to the outer world unless there has been some act that evinces malice, and from which the existence of malice is to be deduced. Consequently, when a man alleges malice against another in a privilege suit he must have some reason from which he has inferred its existence—some reason not in his own mind merely, but deduced from the outward acts or words of the person against whom the allegation is made. All that was laid down in Scott v. Turnbull—it has been frequently laid down before—was that the averment of malice should not be left on the bare allegation of its existence, that he should specify, to some extent at least, the outward acts, words, or circumstances which have led him to infer that the person acted maliciously. I think that is quite reasonable, because otherwise an

and has been so considered ever since. I think that the Lord Ordinary is quite mistaken when he argues, as he appears to do, that the authority of that case has been trenched upon in any subsequent case. I think the Lord Ordinary's criticism is easily seen to be erroneous. His Lordship quotes the case of Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Company.¹ In *Gordon*¹ there were facts and circumstances set forth on the record from which malice could be inferred. In other words, there was no displacing of the dictum of Lord President Inglis, that there must be a statement of facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred; but it was held, in that particular case, that the facts and circumstances were such as those from which malice could be inferred. The case, in other words, fitted the criterion which was laid down in the case of Scott v. Turnbull.² The Lord

M. v. H.
Ld. President.

allegation of malice may be a random suggestion for which the litigant alleging it has no grounds in fact. But I do not think that this case falls under that category. On the contrary, without saying in the least that the facts set out on the record necessarily lead to the conclusion that the proceedings in question were malicious, I think they are at all events facts which a jury are entitled to deliberate upon and decide whether they were in their view sufficient to infer malice.'

"That last paragraph gives what I believe to be the true and full explanation of the law upon the point. I may also refer to the case of Beaton v. Ivory, in 14 R. 1057, in which the late Lord President Inglis, referring to what he had already said in the case of Scott v. Turnbull, says that he did not intend to lay down a general rule in the terms broadly stated in Scott v. Turnbull as applicable to all cases. I think that this indicates that he concurred with the views expressed by Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff in the case I have last quoted. But there are two subsequent cases: the case of Campbell v. Cochrane, 8 F. 205, and the anonymous case A v. B in Court of Session Cases, 1907, 1154, in which words are used by some of the Judges which, I cannot help thinking, cannot be received as of general application. In Campbell v. Cochrane, one or more of the Judges in support of an averment of malice desiderate a statement of tangible antecedent circumstances. In the case of A v. B the Lord President, I think, asks for either something extrinsic or something to be inferred from intrinsic exaggeration of statement. I think all cases of this class have to be referred to their own particular circumstances. And taking the circumstances alleged here, and taking the law as laid down by Lord Moncreiff—to which I entirely subscribe—it seems to me that we have here an allegation of circumstances from which either the Court or a jury may perfectly well and fairly infer malice. There is nothing extrinsic of the case, there are no tangible antecedent circumstances; but there is, on the allegation now made, a reckless use of the pursuer's name in relation to this action of divorce, under circumstances in which the pursuer of that action, finding it necessary to lay hold of some name in order to justify his action, pitches upon the present pursuer, and without inquiry and without being able to justify himself in the result by leading any evidence whatever, asserts that he was engaged for weeks in an illicit intercourse with his wife. It seems to me that, looking to the class of case we are dealing with, if that allegation be true—I do not say that it is sufficient—but I say that at least it sets forth circumstances under which either the Court or a jury might perfectly fairly consider that the pursuer in the action of divorce had acted with such reckless disregard of the interest of a third party as to be equivalent to malice. I shall therefore repel the plea to the relevancy, and send the case to a jury."

July 11, 1908. Justice-Clerk, in this case of Gordon,¹ ends his opinion by saying that the particular facts there were facts which a jury were entitled to deliberate upon, and decide whether they were, in their view, sufficient to infer malice. The Lord Ordinary says this last paragraph gives what he believes to be the full and true explanation of the law. I point out that that is not a general statement of the law, but only what the particular facts in that case were. And, accordingly, I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary when he says that Lord President Inglis, in the subsequent case of Beaton v. Ivory,² referring to what he had said in the case of Scott v. Turnbull,³ and saying that he did not intend to lay down a general rule in these terms applicable to all cases, by that indicated that he had given up his view as expressed in Scott v. Turnbull,³ and adhered to some later view as expressed in Gordon's case.¹ He did no such thing. What he did say in *Beaton v. Ivory*² was to point out that his general observations in *Scott v. Turnbull*³ were directed to cases of judicial slander, and judicial slander only, and that the general rule which he there laid down must not be applied to other cases of slander which were not judicial slander. The result is, as I stated to begin with, that I believe the criterion laid down by Lord President Inglis in *Scott v. Turnbull*³ is the just criterion, and is absolutely unshaken as the law of Scotland.

When one comes to apply that criterion to the present case, what does one find? A gentleman has a confession from his wife in writing, in which she says that she has committed adultery with a certain person, and, upon that confession, and founding upon it, he raises an action against his wife for divorce. In that action he gets decree against his wife. I need scarcely remind your Lordships that one cannot get decree unless the Judge before whom the case depends considers that the statement is not only relevant, but considers also that it is proved; and, inasmuch as persons are not allowed to get decree of divorce if there is collusion, the Judge has to turn his attention to that matter also, and here he has recorded his opinion that there is not a shadow of proof that there was any collusion between the parties. There was not enough evidence to convict the wife without the confession, and it is, of course, trite law that the confession is only evidence against herself, and is as nothing against the co-respondent. Accordingly, for want of sufficient evidence, the Lord Ordinary, I assume perfectly rightly, has assoilzied the co-respondent; and now this co-respondent brings this action against the pursuer in the divorce action (the husband) for judicial slander.

I confess that I have extraordinary difficulty in following a course of reasoning which can possibly think such a statement, made in such circumstances, and leading to such a result as it did in the first case, can be a statement which shews that malicious attitude or intention which is necessary for judicial slander. The Lord Ordinary has put the whole thing upon one sentence—that the pursuer in the divorce action prefaced his statement that, having made inquiries, he made this charge, and he says that the pursuer in the present action denies that any such inquiries were made. I think that the statement “has made inquiries” is sufficiently satisfied by the production of the confession itself. But, if it is not, who is going to judge of what particular amount of inquiry ought to be made? and I suppose, probably, some questions were asked, and even supposing every answer was unfavourable to the idea of adultery having been committed—that is to say, after the husband had asked all such servants as he could find, and everybody who had been with the wife and the co-respondent, and all of them had given a negative answer, and said they had never seen anything wrong—is there anything to prevent the husband founding upon the confession, and the confession alone, and what testimony he might himself supply, and going on to try the case? Supposing he had, on the other hand, missed out that sentence “having made inquiries,” would there be any difference? On the whole matter I think that the case is more than clear, and that we should recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action.

M. v. H.
 Ld. President.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and only wish to repeat an observation which I made in the course of the argument. While the Courts have never gone so far as to extend to written pleadings the absolute privilege that attaches to oral advocacy, yet the distinction is necessarily a thin one. The chief difference seems to be that you take a judicial slander in a pleading out of the region of protection if you shew that it is a statement which is not pertinent to the action. But where it is pertinent, and especially where it has been held to be relevant, and is a ground of action that satisfied the Judge before whom the case was heard—if you have these ingredients it is plain that it would be almost impossible to formulate a substantial case of malice proper to be submitted to a jury. I think Mr Morison was well founded in what he said, that it is only in cases where a process has been concocted for the purpose of doing injury to some outside person that the Courts have found averments of malice sufficient to entitle a pursuer to go to a jury. But, in the present case, while it is said, no doubt, that this was a feigned action—that the parties merely wished to be separated, and that the Lord Ordinary was imposed on—it is not stated, and obviously it could not be stated, that this action of divorce was got up for the purpose of doing an injury to the present pursuer. It is therefore not within the class of cases in which an issue of judicial slander can be sent to a jury.

I must add that I have also considerable difficulty on the question of damage, because it does not seem to me—although that is not necessary to our judgment—it does not seem to me very likely that in a case of this kind damage which was capable of being estimated in money could ever be proved.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree. I agree with Lord M'Laren that the case we have to consider is not exactly the same as the case that arises on the privilege of counsel or the privilege of witnesses. The question is what privilege the law allows to the parties to an action in stating the facts which may be necessary to support their pleas. Now, as I understand the law, if a litigant makes a relevant averment in support of his case, he is not answerable in damages to a third person merely because that averment may

Now, as I understand the law, if a litigant makes a relevant averment in support of his case, he is not answerable in damages to a third person merely because that averment may July 11, 1908. turn out to be inaccurate and to be injurious to the person complaining.

M. v. H. The privilege which a litigant has—which is indispensable for the administration of justice—allows him to make such averments without subjecting himself to actions of that kind. But, then, I have no doubt he may be made liable if it can be shewn that he made the averment complained of, not with the direct motive of supporting his own case, but with some indirect motive, as, for example, injuring the character of the person complaining.

Lord Kinnear.

Now, I cannot see that there is the slightest ground for saying that there is an averment here of any such indirect malicious motive. The defender's statement was absolutely relevant to the case, and the present pursuer does not say that he made it with any other purpose than that of supporting the case which he brought into Court. On the contrary, he avers that he did intend the averment to support his case and made it for that purpose. Therefore I am unable to see that there is any relevant averment of malice, or that there is any issuable matter on record.

I desire to add that I agree with what your Lordship in the chair stated, that the law as laid down by Lord President Inglis in *Scott v. Turnbull*¹ is absolutely untouched by any subsequent decision, and must govern this case.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender.

Insurance—Life Insurance—Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 4, subsec. 2, and sec. 14, subsec. 1—Transfer to another company—Notice.—The Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 26), enacts:—Sec. 4. “(1) A member of or person insured with a collecting society or industrial assurance company shall not, except”—(here followed certain exceptions not material for the purposes of this report)—“become, or be made a member of or be insured with any other such society or company without his written consent . . . (2) The society or company to which the member or person is sought to be transferred shall, within seven days from his application for admission to that society or company, give notice thereof in writing to the society or company from which he is sought to be transferred.”

Sec. 14. “(1) It shall be an offence under this Act if . . . (c) A collecting society or industrial assurance company to which a member or person is sought to be transferred fails to give such notice as is by this Act required.”

F., who was insured with an industrial assurance company (company A), in September 1906 applied for and obtained a policy of insurance from another industrial assurance company (company B). F. paid the weekly premium on both insurances down to 10th December 1906. F. thereafter applied for and obtained from the B company a policy on the same terms as he got from the A company. The provisions of the new policy were more favourable to the assured than the provisions of the general tables of company B, and the insurance required to be sanctioned by the directors of company B. The directors were not, but the agent who negotiated with F. was, aware that F. had been insured with company A. F.'s insurance with company A did not lapse for about two months after he had ceased paying his contributions. No notice was sent by company B to company A.

Held that the transaction was a transfer of F.'s insurance from company A to company B, and that company B not having given notice in terms of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, sec. 4 (2), had committed an offence under sec. 14 (1).

THE SALVATION ARMY ASSURANCE SOCIETY, LIMITED, an industrial assurance company within the meaning of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal of Lanarkshire, brought a complaint in the Sheriff Court at Lanarkshire against the British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The complaint set forth:—"That the British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited, being an industrial assurance company within the meaning of the said Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, . . . did on or about the 24th day of December 1906 receive proposals for insurance . . . upon the lives of Peter, Mary, David, Marion, and James Findlay, . . . and did on or about the 27th day of December 1906 issue policies of insurance upon the lives of the said Peter, Mary, David, Marion, and James Findlay . . . while the said persons were insured with the complainers, the Salvation Army Assurance Society, Limited, under policies of insurance, . . . the fact of the said persons being insured with the complainers as aforesaid being well known to the said British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited, or alternatively, the said British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited, having culpably failed to ascertain the fact of said insurance with the complainers, and that the said British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited, did fail to give notice to the complainers . . . of the said proposals for insurance made to the said British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited, which were proposals to be transferred from the said Salvation Army Assurance Society, Limited, to the said British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited, within the meaning of the said Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, . . . contrary to the said Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, sections 4 and 14, and contrary to the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, sections 86, 89, 91, and 102."

On 10th December 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie) assoilzied the respondents.

The complainers obtained a case for appeal which set forth that the following facts were proved:—" (1) In the year 1904, James Findlay . . . effected insurances on the lives of himself, his wife, and his children . . . with the complaining Society. . . . (3) In September 1906 Findlay approached the respondents' agent, Matthew Ferris, with proposals for insurance on his own life and the life of his wife, and these proposals having been accepted, the proposed insurances with the respondent Company were effected. The benefits secured and the premiums payable under these insurances were different from the benefits secured and premiums payable under Findlay's insurances with the complaining Society. (4) From September to December 1906 Findlay paid the premiums due on his insurances with both Insurance Companies, but in December, having become dissatisfied with the attention he was receiving from the complainers' collectors, he resolved to leave the complainers' Society, and intimated this resolution to one of their collectors. The premiums due to that Society had generally been collected once a fortnight, and the last payment by Findlay was made on 10th December 1906. His intimation to the complainers' collector, just referred to, was made in the course of the following week. (5) Shortly after giving this intimation Findlay requested the respondents' agent—the said Matthew Ferris—to call upon him, and the agent having done so, Findlay proposed to him that he should take over the insurances which he had with the complaining Society. The respondents' agent at first declined on the ground that his Company did not do transfer business, but, on Findlay explaining that it was not a transfer which he was proposing, but that he was leaving the complainers, and had stopped paying them premiums, the respondents' agent proceeded to consider the application. Findlay further informed the respondents' agent that his Company might have the business if they would secure him in immediate benefits of £12, 10s. on his own life and £12 on the life of his wife, at weekly premiums of 2½d. and 2d. respectively. These were the same benefits as Findlay was entitled to under his insurance with the complainers' Society. It was not proved that Findlay told the respondents' agent this. The respondents' agent made no inquiry either at this or any other time as to whether Findlay's insurance with the complainers' Society had or had not lapsed. (6) The terms asked by Findlay being more favourable to the insured than those provided in the general tables of the respondent Company, it was beyond their agent's authority to accept them on his own initiative. He accordingly reported the matter to the district superintendent of the Company, who visited Cowdenbeath about this time. He informed the superintendent that Findlay had been insured with the complainers, but had ceased to be a member of their Society. (7) On receiving the agent's report, the district superintendent of the respondents' Company, accompanied by the agent, interviewed Findlay in regard to his application, and . . . on 21st December 1906 took from Findlay a proposal in writing for insurance on his own life and the lives of his wife and his children . . . The benefits stipulated for were substantially identical with those secured by Findlay's insurance with the complainers' Society, and the weekly premiums payable were the same. (8) Having received this proposal, the respondents' agent and superintendent forwarded it . . . to the district office of the Company at Edinburgh, with the recommendation that it should be accepted. . . . (9) The proposal was subsequently forwarded from the Edinburgh office, with the recommendation of the local manager, to the head office in Glasgow, and there submitted to the directors of the Company, who sanctioned its acceptance, after which policies were issued on 27th December. The insurances in question were not based on the tables contained in any public prospectus issued by the respondents, but on tables issued for the private information of agents of the Company. (10) Neither the Edinburgh office nor the head office were informed that Findlay had been insured with the complainers' Society. (11) No notice of Findlay's application was given by respondents to the complainers. (12) At the time when the policies were issued by the respondent Company, Findlay's insurances with the complainers had not lapsed. They did not lapse till February." Salvation

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—“(1) Upon the facts above stated to have been proved, were James Findlay and his family transferred, or sought to be transferred, from the complaining Society to the respondent Company, within the meaning of sec. 4 (2) of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896? (2) Upon the facts above stated as proved, were the respondent Company rightly assoltized from the complaint?”

The case was heard before the Second Division on 18th June 1908.

Argued for the complainers and appellants;—The word “transferred” in section 4 (2) referred to transfer of custom. There was a transfer whenever a person insured with one industrial assurance company took out a policy with another such company, and there was a seeking to transfer whenever a person insured with one industrial company was approached by the agent of another company with the object of inducing the assured to take out a policy with the second company.¹ Such an enactment was necessary for the protection of industrial companies. In the case of an ordinary insurance, the insurance lapsed ipso facto if the assured did not pay his premiums at the proper time. But in the case of industrial companies the statute provided that the insurance should not lapse until (1) notice was given by the company to the assured that the insurance would be forfeited in case of default of payment within a certain time, and (2) default had taken place.² Now, a company might well be disposed to refrain from giving notice to a contributor who was unable to pay his contributions on account of temporary embarrassment, but would be very prompt to give notice to a contributor who was unable to pay because he had taken out a policy with another company. It was unreasonable that an industrial company should be exposed to the risk of being placed in the position of giving time to a contributor who was using his money to keep up a policy with a rival company. It was therefore reasonable to provide that whenever a person insured with one company was approached by another company, notice should be given to the first company. It followed that there might be a transfer although the insurance with the second company was not substituted for the insurance with the first company. There might be a transfer although both insurances co-existed.³ If that were so, it was plain that an offence had been committed.⁴ But even if it were necessary that there should be a substitution, there was a substitution here.

a popular sense. It meant the carrying over either of a member or of a policy of insurance from one company to another. It did not include the case of a person already insured entering into an additional contract of insurance. The mischief struck at was poaching. If a company attempted to take away a customer from the company with which he was insured, it was quite reasonable that it should have to give notice, so that the first company might have an opportunity of making representations, and, if possible, of retaining its customer. The object was to enable the first company to protect its vested interests, not to enable it to exhaust the customer's potential capacity for business. If the respondents' construction of the sections were right, no offence had been committed. No attempt had been made to induce Findlay to leave the complainers and come over to the respondents. Accordingly, there was no seeking to transfer, and no notice was required. The case of the Pearl Life Assurance Company, Limited,¹ was distinguishable. All that was held there was that there might be a seeking to transfer although the old and the new insurances were in existence at the same time. That was plainly sound law, but it did not touch the present case.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—It is perhaps unfortunate that in this appeal, which calls for the construction of the Act 59 and 60 Vict. cap. 56, bearing a title which is not self explanatory, we have no aid from a preamble, to shew what was the mischief or mischiefs intended to be remedied. But I think we may safely gather from the Act itself that there were at least three mischiefs which the Act had in view. The first was that in the case of these small insurances—insurances on any one life for a sum of less than £20—they might be forfeited for non-payment of the contribution or premium without notice. The second was that such insurances might be transferred or sought to be transferred from one society or insurance company to another without the written consent of the person insured. And the third was that the canvassing by agents for such insurance societies or companies should be checked. The first of these mischiefs was dealt with by section 3 of the Act, which required that a notice should be served on the person insured by the insuring society or company requiring payment by the insured person of his contribution within not less than fourteen days. The second mischief was dealt with by section 4 (1), which required the written consent of the insured person, or, in the case of an infant, of his father or other guardian, to any transfer of his insurance from one such society or company to another. And the third mischief was dealt with by section 4 (2), which provided that within seven days of the insured person's application for admission to the new society or company a notice thereof should be given in writing to the society or company from which he was sought to be transferred.

The Sheriff-substitute, who heard the case, has given a careful judgment, in which he has held, among the facts proved, that the first approach to the respondents' agent (Ferris) was made by the insured person (Findlay) himself, that at first no attempt was made by Ferris to induce Findlay to effect an matter to the respondents' superintendent, who received Findlay's proposals in writing and forwarded them to the head office, and that in the end these were accepted, in ignorance that Findlay had been insured with the complaining Society, though they substantially secured the same benefits as in the case of the latter. I do not wonder, therefore, that the Sheriff-substitute has held that in the circumstances there was no offence under the Act, and has assoilzied the respondents, for it is hard to say that on the facts so found any moral blame lay either with the respondents' head office or even with Ferris, their canvasser.

But I have come to the conclusion that, at all events, a technical offence has been committed under the Act, though it is not a case for inflicting anything but a very modified penalty. Indeed, Mr Clyde, for the complaining Society, did not ask for more.

It is always desirable that in the construction of an Imperial statute the Courts of the two countries should speak with the same voice, though a Scottish Court may not, strictly speaking, be bound by the decision of an English one. Now, the only case in which this statute has been construed in England is that of the Pearl Insurance Company.¹ There an alderman of the city of London had held that there was no transfer, or seeking to transfer, where no two insurances had been shewn to co-exist. But a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr Justice Wills and Mr Justice Phillimore, reversed his decision, holding that there was a seeking to transfer in the sense of the Act, and remitted to him to convict. I think we must hold to this decision. There was in this case a co-existence of two insurances substantially securing the same benefits in return for the same contributions for a short time, though the persons concerned in the transaction may not have known or intended it. Accordingly, the complaining Society ought to have received notice of Findlay's proposal for admission to the respondents' Company in terms of section 4 (2), and the omission to send such notice constituted, at all events, a technical contravention of the Act.

LORD LOW.—I think that sections 3 and 4 of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, are intended for the protection both of persons insuring with such societies or companies and of the societies and companies themselves.

Section 3 confers a benefit upon the person insured, because it provides that forfeiture of the insurance shall not be incurred by reason of any default in paying any contribution until after notice has been given to the insured that in case of default of payment by him, within a certain time and at a certain place, the insurance will be forfeited, and until default has been made in paying the contribution in accordance with that notice.

Subsection 1 of section 4 also contains provisions in favour of the assured. It is in these terms :—"A member of or person insured with a collecting society or industrial assurance company shall not . . . become or be made a member of or be insured with any other such society or company without his written consent, or, in the case of an infant, without the consent of his father or other guardian."

I imagine that the main object of that enactment is to protect persons insured against the solicitations of collecting agents of such societies or companies. I suppose that such agents are paid by results, and that therefore the interest of each agent is to obtain as much business as possible for the society or company which he represents. He is therefore likely to exalt the merits of his company beyond those of all other companies, and to try and persuade a person insured with another company to leave that company and take out an insurance with that which he represents, or to insure with the latter company in addition to the insurance already effected with the other company. I think that the enactment, if read according to the natural meaning of the language used, covers both of these cases, and provides that in either of them the written consent of the insured shall be obtained.

Subsection 2 of section 4 (upon which the question at issue mainly turns) is designed for the protection of the society or the company, and here again I think that the risks mainly in view were those arising from what I shall call the excessive zeal of their collectors. The subsection runs thus :—"The society or company to which the member or person is sought to be transferred shall, within seven days from his application for admission to that society or company, give notice thereof in writing to the society or company from which he is sought to be transferred."

That seems to me to be an enactment unusually difficult of construction, and I cannot pretend to have arrived at any confident opinion as to what its meaning truly is.

In the first place, it deals with the same persons as fall within the scope of the previous subsection. That is plain from the use of the expression "the member or person." That being so, one would rather expect that subsection 2 would be the correlative of subsection 1, and would deal, from the point of view of the society or company, with both of the situations in which a member or person insured may apparently find himself under subsection 1,—that is to say, both with the case of a person dropping his connection with one company and becoming a member of or insuring with another, or becoming a member of or insuring with that other company without dropping the first.

The difficulty in adopting that construction is occasioned by the use of the word "transferred." Mr Clyde argued that the transference contemplated was a transference of what he called custom, which covered the case of a person effecting an insurance with a new company while retaining that in a company with which he was already insured. It seems to me that that construction is negatived by the words actually used, because it is the person that is spoken of as being "transferred." The precise words are July 11, 1908. "the member or person sought to be transferred." Now, if a person is transferred from one place to another, or from one company to another, he is taken out of the first and put into the second; if he is transferred he cannot be partly in one and partly in the other.

Salvation Army Assurance Society
v. British Legal Life Assurance Co.

I am therefore unable, without unduly straining the language used, to read subsection 2 as providing for any other case than that of a person stopping his insurance with one company for the purpose of effecting an insurance with another. I say, for the purpose of effecting an insurance with another, because I do not think that the mere fact that the person insuring with a company had at some previous period of his life been insured with another company would of itself bring the case within subsection 2. For example, if a man came to the conclusion that he could not afford to continue paying premiums and therefore allowed an insurance which he had to drop, and a considerable time afterwards changed his mind and effected a new insurance with another company, I do not think that that would be a transfer within the meaning of the enactment.

Further, I think that subsection 2 of section 4 must be read in connection with section 3. If a man was unable to pay his contribution by reason of illness, or inability to obtain work, or other innocent misfortune, the company with which he was insured might be disposed to treat him with great consideration, whereas if they found that he had stopped paying his contribution because he had effected an insurance with a rival company, they might consider it prudent to give the notice required by section 3 as early as possible. I therefore think that the provisions of subsection 2 of section 4 were intended to prevent a company with whom a person was assured being prejudiced by the benefit conferred upon him by section 3, in cases where the reason for his stopping payment of his contribution was that he had transferred his insurance to another company.

Again, section 14, subsection 1 (b) and (c), require to be considered. That subsection makes it an offence under the Act (b) if a person attempts to transfer a member or person from one society or company to another without the written consent required by section 4 (1); and (c) if a society or company to which a member or person is sought to be transferred fails to give the notice required by section 4 (2). In both cases the offence is only committed in the case of there being a transference, and accordingly I do not think that a person or a society or company could be convicted of an offence under the 14th section if what had been done had merely been to effect an additional insurance with a second society or company, leaving the insurance with the first society or company in force, and payment of contributions in respect thereof being continued.

As regards the present case the facts are very clearly stated by the Sheriff-substitute, and upon these facts I am of opinion that the transaction referred to in the complaint was truly a transfer of Findlay's insurance from the complainers' Society to the respondents' Company. Findlay, who was insured with the complainers, stopped paying his contributions to them, and immediately effected with the respondents an insurance which secured to him the same benefits for payment of the same contributions as his insurance with the complainers had done. Further, the terms upon which the respon-

Lord Low.

July 11, 1908. Salvation Army Assurance Society v. British Legal Life Assurance Co. dents insured Findlay were more favourable to the insured than those provided in their general tables, and required to be sanctioned by the directors. That, I think, constituted a clear case of the transfer of an insurance within the meaning of the Act.

Lord Low. I am therefore of opinion that an offence under the Act was committed, although I agree with your Lordship that having regard to the circumstances stated in the case it was merely a technical offence. There is no reason to suppose that any of the officials of the respondent Company, except Ferris, the collector, who arranged the matter with Findlay, knew that Findlay had been insured with the complainers, and Ferris cannot be charged with anything more serious than that, according to my view, he put a wrong construction upon section 4 (2) of the Act, which is not surprising. Therefore, although I think that the respondents should have been convicted of the offence libelled, I am of opinion that it was a case for a merely nominal penalty.

LORD ARDWALL concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Act of Parliament upon which this case is based was passed for the purpose of protecting the small insurer from several evils. One was that the companies or societies which granted small insurances had to be restrained from cutting off the insured from the benefit of the insurance and so holding past premiums while getting rid of their obligation. Therefore it was provided that forfeit should not take place without sufficient notice to the assured, who was in arrear, and giving him the opportunity to pay up overdue premiums. A second purpose was to prevent persons insured being induced under pressure to transfer their insurance from one company or society to another, unless written consent was obtained. Improper canvassing was also struck at.

Accordingly under the Act fourteen days' notice must be given of any intended forfeit, and where a transfer is proposed there must be a written consent of the party, or of the parent or guardian of a minor; and where any insured applies to a new insurance company or society, notice is required to be given to the original insurers within seven days of his application.

In this case it appears that one Findlay, a person insured with the complainers, approached the agent of the respondents in the appeal desiring to effect an insurance, and that at first the agent did not try to induce Findlay to insure with him. Thereafter Findlay renewed his application and was granted an insurance with the respondents. For some time thereafter Findlay kept up both insurances, and then being dissatisfied with the complainers, stopped his payments to them, and asked the agent of the respondents to give him an insurance on the same terms as he enjoyed with the complainers. At this time the insurance with the complainers was still in force. The agent had no power to grant special terms, and the matter was referred to his superiors, who granted the concession. It is only fair to say that they were not aware, as the agent was, that Findlay had held an insurance from the complainers.

On these facts my opinion is that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute is erroneous, and that the complainers are entitled to a judgment on the latter transaction. That which was done, was done without obedience to July 11, 1908. the statutory direction being fulfilled, which requires that notice be given. It may be that there was no evil motive as a cause of the breach of the Army Assurance Society v. British Legal Life Assurance Co. statute, but the offence is a technical one, and it is not necessary that there should be any wilfulness to constitute it. Unless we are to go contrary to the decision in the Pearl Insurance Company case,¹ we must hold that a technical offence has been committed, and while the decision of an English Court is not a binding authority on this Court, it is entitled to all respectful consideration. My own opinion is that it was rightly decided. I should have been in favour of a judgment to the same effect had this been the first case occurring under the Act. Whatever difficulty may be created by the word "transfer" in the statute, which has led to much discussion, I have no doubt that what was done here was a transfer in the sense of the Act.

If that be a sound view, as I understand your Lordships hold it to be, there must be a conviction and a penalty. But in the circumstances of the case there does not seem to be any ground for more than a nominal penalty, as the case is one really for the purpose of having the law applicable to a particular set of circumstances settled, and indeed the complainers, through their counsel, expressed their desire that the case should be so dealt with.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first question of law . . . in the affirmative, and the second question . . . in the negative: Find and declare accordingly: Recall the determination of the Sheriff-substitute, and remit to him to convict the respondents accordingly, and decern: Find the appellants entitled to their expenses. . . ."

Boyd's
Trustees v.
Boyd.

2D DIVISION. THIS was a special case brought with reference to the estate of James Lawrence Boyd of Glendouglie, who died on 11th March 1907. The first parties to the case were Mr Boyd's trustees, acting under his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th January 1901, and codicils thereto; the second party was James Lawrence Boyd, Mr Boyd's residuary legatee; and the third parties were the trustees acting under a deed of trust granted by Mr Boyd, of date 21st October 1878.

The moveable estate left by Mr Boyd included shares of banks and public companies, amounting in value to upwards of £16,400, upon which there was an uncalled liability, and the first question in the case was as to the trustees' power to retain these shares. By his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th January 1901, Mr Boyd conferred upon his trustees, in addition to the statutory powers of investment competent to gratuitous trustees, a power of investment “in the purchase or on the security of heritage in Scotland, in debentures of public or incorporated companies, and in debentures or debenture stock of railways and other public companies in Great Britain; also to deposit with any bank, including any colonial bank having a branch in this country.” A codicil, dated 20th June 1901, contained the following clause:—“I authorise my trustees to hold any investments I may die possessed of for such time as they may think fit.” By an earlier codicil (which was holograph and signed, but was left unfinished), dated 6th March 1901, Mr Boyd, while authorising his trustees to retain any securities or investments which he might hold at his death, excepted “such stocks as have an uncalled liability,” but this codicil was found by the Court to have been revoked by the codicil of date 20th June 1901.

The first parties maintained that it was within their power as trustees to continue to hold the shares with an uncalled liability above mentioned, if and so long as they were satisfied of the safety of the said shares as a trust investment. The second party maintained that these shares were not “investments” within the meaning of the codicil of 20th June 1901, and that, in any event, the trustees were not entitled to retain such investments indefinitely at their pleasure.

The second question in the case arose as to a claim for arrears of interest made by the third parties, the trustees acting under the deed of trust, dated 21st October 1878, above mentioned. This deed was executed when in consequence of the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank Mr Boyd had become involved in heavy liabilities, and was in the following terms:—“I . . . considering that the making of a reasonable provision for the aliment of my wife and the children (if any) of our marriage is a duty incumbent on me, and being a burden on me and my means and estate, should be satisfied and paid therefrom: Therefore I have resolved to set apart and invest a sum of four thousand pounds in the names of the after-mentioned trustees for the above purpose, and having of even date herewith executed an assignation of a bond and disposition in security over subjects in Leith, which assignation is granted in favour of” [here followed the names of the trustees] “as trustees for the purposes set forth in these presents.”

The truster declared that the trustees should "stand possessed of July 11, 1908. the said sum of £4000, and interests and proceeds thereof, in trust for the following ends, uses, and purposes, viz., in the first place, ^{Boyd's} the said trustees shall hold the said trust premises," inter alia, "for Trustees v. ^{Boyd.} behoof of my wife, in liferent for her liferent use allenarly, exclusive of all my marital rights and interests of every kind," and for payment of the annual proceeds to her on her own receipt, without his concurrence, during all the days and years of her life.

The bond and disposition in security on the subjects in Leith was subsequently discharged, and in 1885 Mr Boyd granted to the trustees a bond and disposition in security for the said sum on his estate of Pittencrieff. This bond and disposition in security and the trust-deed were in Mr Boyd's possession at the date of his death, but it was stated in the special case that the parties believed the trust-deed was originally delivered by Mr Boyd to the agent for the trustees, and returned by him to Mr Boyd.

By a minute, of date 14th May 1879, the trustees, acting on the said trust, authorised and empowered Mrs Boyd to receive and discharge the interest of the said sum of £4000. A certified copy of this minute was found in Mr Boyd's repositories after his death, along with a letter from Mrs Boyd to the trustees under the said trust-deed in the following terms:—"Edinburgh, 25th May 1889.—To the trustees acting under deed of trust by my husband, dated 21st October 1878. Dear Sirs,—I beg to acquaint you that I have duly received payment, through my husband, of the annual interest accruing on the funds under your charge half-yearly, as the same became due, up to and including the term of Whitsunday 1889.—Yours faithfully, ANNE M. BOYD."

With regard to this letter the parties in the special case stated:—"This document is in the handwriting of a former clerk of Mr Boyd's. It was handed to Mrs Boyd by her husband as a document requiring her signature, and she signed it. She received no explanation as to the meaning of the document or the purpose for which it was required, and she did not ask for any explanation. In point of fact, Mrs Boyd had not, at the date of the document, received payment, through her husband or otherwise, of the annual interest prior to that date. The interest which accrued upon the said sum of £4000 prior to the granting by Mr Boyd of the said bond and disposition in security on 14th July 1885 was uplifted by Mr Boyd and applied to his own purposes, and he never paid any interest either to the trustees or to Mrs Boyd upon the said bond and disposition in security. None of the interest upon the said trust fund was set aside or ear-marked in any way by Mr Boyd, and it cannot now be traced. From the date of the trust, Mrs Boyd was alimented by her husband in his house. No receipts were signed by Mrs Boyd for the half year's interest, either prior or subsequent to the letter of 25th May 1889, nor did she subsequently sign any similar letter to the said trustees."

The first and second parties maintained that the trust, in so far as it conferred any benefit upon Mrs Boyd, was a revocable donation, and that the gift of the income of the £4000, so far as accruing during Mr Boyd's lifetime, was revoked by him; that, in any event, the income, if it was exigible, must be presumed to have been paid, and was not extant, and that the amount thereof was not a debt due by July 11, 1908. the first parties to the third parties; and that interest was, in no event, due on it.

Boyd's
Trustees v.
Boyd.

The third parties maintained that Mr Boyd made a gift to his wife of the income of the £4000 as it accrued; that this gift was unrecalled and formed a debt on Mr Boyd's estate; and that they were entitled to recover the interest accruing after Whitsunday 1878, the letter of date 25th May 1889 being neither a receipt nor a discharge of the income, and not being capable of operating as a bar to their receiving income which had not in fact been paid.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"1. Is it within the power of the first parties to retain the shares" with an uncalled liability above mentioned "indefinitely at their pleasure, notwithstanding that there is attached to them a liability to pay uncalled capital? Or are they bound to realise the same for the purpose of reinvestment? 2. Are the third parties entitled (a) to payment on behalf of Mrs Boyd of the income accruing on the sum of £4000 under the deed of trust, dated 21st October 1878, and amounting as at Martinmas 1906 to the sum of £3990; or are they entitled (b) to payment of the sum of £2450, being the income on the said sum for the period from Whitsunday 1889 to Martinmas 1906, or of any part thereof? In either event, are they entitled (c) to interest on the arrears of said income; and if so, at what rate?"

On the first question the undernoted cases were cited.¹

On the second question the undernoted cases were cited.²

LORD LOW.—The first question in this case is whether the testamentary trustees of the late deceased Mr James Lawrence Boyd are entitled to retain certain shares in public companies which belonged to the truster, and upon which there is uncalled liability.

There was found in the truster's repositories a holograph writing of a testamentary nature, signed by him, dated 6th March 1901, and he also left a codicil to his trust-disposition and settlement, duly tested, dated 20th June 1901. By the holograph writing the truster gave power to his trustees "to retain for such time as they may think fit any securities or investments which I may hold at the time of my death, with the exception of such stocks as may have an uncalled liability": while by the codicil of 20th June he authorised his trustees "to hold any investments I may die possessed of for such time as they may think fit," there being in the latter case no exception of stocks having an uncalled liability.

The holograph writing was in some important respects incomplete, and July 11, 1908. that fact, coupled with the circumstances narrated in the special case, suggests that it was intended to be no more than a draft of a proposed ^{Boyd's} Trustees v. codicil. The writing, however, was, as I have said, signed by the truster, ^{Boyd.} and that being so, I do not think that effect could have been refused to it Lord Low. as a testamentary writing if it had not been superseded by the codicil of 20th June. But it appears to me to have been entirely superseded by that codicil. The writing, besides containing the power to the trustees which I have quoted, gave directions in regard to the disposal of the residue of the truster's estate. The codicil also disposed of the residue and authorised the trustees to hold investments possessed by him in the terms to which I have referred. That being so, I am of opinion that the writing was altogether superseded and revoked, and that the truster must be held to have intentionally in the codicil omitted from the power, which he gave to his trustees to hold investments, the exception of stock having an uncalled liability.

The result is that the power which the trustees have is to hold investments of which the truster died possessed for such time as they may think fit. Of course, in exercising such a power, trustees must act prudently, and they are only entitled to retain such investments if they are satisfied that to do so will be for the benefit of the trust. In the statement of the contention of the parties in the special case the trustees (the first parties) only claim right to retain the shares referred to "so long as they are satisfied of the safety of the said shares as a trust investment." I think that that is an accurate statement of their right, and if the first question had been framed in similar terms I should have had no hesitation in answering it in the affirmative. As framed, however, the question is whether the first parties are entitled to retain the shares "indefinitely at their pleasure." I am not prepared to affirm their right to retain in such wide terms, but if the words "indefinitely at their pleasure" be omitted, I am of opinion that the first branch of the first question may be answered in the affirmative, and the second branch in the negative.

The second question is attended with more difficulty, and arises in this way. When the City of Glasgow Bank stopped payment in 1878 the truster was upon the register of shareholders in respect of certain shares which he held in trust. He was, accordingly, a contributory, and the result might very well have been to ruin him. In these circumstances he executed a deed of trust, dated 21st October 1878, by which, upon the narrative that "the making of a reasonable provision for the aliment of my wife and children (if any) of our marriage is a duty incumbent on me," he assigned a bond and disposition in security for the sum of £4000 over certain subjects in Leith to trustees, and directed them, in the first place, to hold the fund for behoof of his wife "in liferent for her liferent use allenary, exclusive of all my marital rights and interests of every kind, and to pay over the annual proceeds to her on her own receipt, without my concurrence, during all the days and years of her life."

The £4000 contained in the bond and disposition in security was repaid in 1885, and the fund was then invested upon the security of an estate belonging to the truster. The trustees never uplifted the interest during the truster's lifetime, having by minute dated 14th May 1879 authorised alternative of the first question of law . . . in the affirmative, and the second alternative of said first question in the negative: Answer branch (b) of the second question of law . . . in the affirmative, with the deletion of the words 'or any part thereof,' and branches (a) and (c) of said second question in the negative: Find and declare accordingly, and decern."

Fleming, K.C.—Macphail.

Lord
Ruthven v.
Drummond.

Arrestment—Subjects arrestable—Alimentary fund—Entail—Disentail—Settlement of disentailed money.—In a petition for disentail of an entailed sum of money presented by the heir in possession, the next heir consented to the disentail on condition that the balance of the disentailed sum, after satisfying certain debts of the disentailer, should be put in trust to provide an alimentary liferent to the disentailer. The value of the next heir's expectancy and certain debts due to him by the disentailer exceeded in amount the balance of the disentailed sum put in trust.

Arrestments having been used by creditors of the disentailer in the hands of the trustees, held that in the circumstances the trust money had really been settled by the next heir, and not by the disentailer, and that consequently the alimentary restriction was valid; and arrestments recalled.

Arrestment—Recall—Recall on ground that subjects not arrestable—Process—Competency—Competency of considering question of right in petition for recall.—Held that, where no action of furthcoming had been raised, the question whether a fund arrested was subject to the diligence of creditors could be determined in a petition for recall of the arrestments.

Brand v. Kent, Nov. 12, 1892, 20 R. 29, commented on.

1ST DIVISION.

THIS was a petition by the Right Honourable Walter James Hore Ruthven, Baron Ruthven of Freeland, for recall of arrestments used by Messrs Drummond, creditors of his lordship, against trustees holding a fund for, inter alia, the purpose of providing an alimentary liferent to his lordship. The question raised was whether the restriction of Lord Ruthven's provision to an alimentary liferent was good against the diligence of his creditors.

The petition was presented in the following circumstances:—

In 1873 Lord Ruthven, who was heir of entail in possession of the entailed estate of Freeland, sold that estate for the payment of debts affecting it, and after paying the debts the balance of the purchase price was invested in trust in terms of section 9 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1868.¹

In 1892 there remained in the hands of the trustees a sum of £30,000, and Lord Ruthven, being desirous of disentailing that sum for the purpose of paying off further indebtedness, applied to the next heir of entail, his son, the Master of Ruthven, whose consent was necessary, to grant his consent to the disentail. At that date the sum due to outside creditors was £9000, while the balance of £21,000 was more than covered by a debt due to the Master of Ruthven of £11,356, 4s. 9d., and the value of his expectancy, viz., £12,300.

 his father, dated 13th March and 11th April 1892, which proceeded on a narrative of the foregoing facts and on the consideration that "in order to enable the said Baron Ruthven to pay debts now due by him and to effect an arrangement of the claims against him of me the said Master of Ruthven . . . he is desirous of acquiring with my consent the said balance of £30,000 remaining entailed." The parties then proceeded to agree that, on the £30,000 being disentailed (in the first place) out of the sum thereby acquired certain provisions should be made for Lady Ruthven and the younger children, and £9000 should be applied in paying off Lord Ruthven's debts to outside creditors; (in the second place), that the balance then remaining of the £30,000, and also Lord Ruthven's reversionary interest in the estate of Harperstown in Ireland, should be transferred and conveyed to Mr George Auldjo Jamieson, W.S. (whom failing, Mr C. J. G. Paterson, C.A.), and Mr A. R. C. Pitman, W.S., to be held by them as trustees for the following trust purposes:—(1) and (2) for payment of the expenses of the trust and of the disentail. (3) "To pay in each year from the first day of January 1892 out of the free income of the residue of the trust-estate £1000 in the event of the free income for the year exceeding that sum or the whole free income in the event of its not exceeding £1000 to the said Baron Ruthven and Lady Ruthven during their joint lives upon their joint receipt and to the said Baron Ruthven if he shall be the survivor during his life after the said Lady Ruthven's death; and that as a provision for their and his alimentary support and maintenance, and for the alimentary support, maintenance, and education of the children of the marriage between the said Baron and Lady Ruthven other than me the said Master of Ruthven, declaring as it is hereby specially provided and declared as an essential part of the arrangements in terms of which I the said Master of Ruthven have consented to discharge my claim for compensation in respect of the disentail or acquisition in fee-simple of said trust fund, and the said debts due to me by the said Lord Ruthven as hereinafter provided . . . that the said provision of income to the said Baron Ruthven and Lady Ruthven, and to the said Baron Ruthven if he shall be the survivor, shall be purely alimentary and for the purpose above expressed, and shall not be affectable for or by the debts or deeds of the said Baron Ruthven and Lady Ruthven, or either of them, or of the said Baron Ruthven if the survivor, or the diligence of their, his, or her creditors." The other trust purposes were declared to be—payment of the surplus revenue to the Master; payment of an annuity to Lady Ruthven should she survive her husband; payment of £6000 to the Master, should he demand it; and payment of the whole residue and remainder to the Master. The agreement went on to provide (in the third place) that the furniture and plenishing at Barncluith House should be made over to the Master. (In the fourth place) "I, the said Master of Ruthven, shall be bound and obliged, and I hereby bind and oblige myself, to execute and deliver when required a valid and effectual deed of consent to the disentail or acquisition in fee-simple by the said Baron Ruthven of the said trust fund of Thirty thousand pounds; and upon the whole arrangements before expressed 'In the first place' 'In the second place' and 'In the third place' being given effect to, I, the said Master of Ruthven, agree to accept the rights to be thereby conferred upon me as in satisfaction of my claim to compensation in respect of the disentail or acquisition in fee-simple of the said trust fund of Thirty thousand pounds, and to discharge my claim for compensation accordingly ; and further, I, the said Master of Ruthven, agree, but only upon the said whole arrangements being given effect to as aforesaid, to discharge the said debts due to me by the said Baron Ruthven." (In the fifth place) it was provided that, if from any circumstance Lord Ruthven should be unable to carry out his obligations under the agreement, the agreement should be void, and the Master should instantly receive the £12,300 agreed on as the value of his expectancy, and that all the other claims competent to him should, in that event, be preserved entire.

The Court thereafter sanctioned the disentail of the £30,000, and the balance of that sum was duly paid over to Mr Jamieson and Mr Pitman, as trustees, in terms of the agreement.

On 17th April 1907 Messrs Drummond, bankers, London, and George James Drummond, a partner of that firm, brought an action against Lord Ruthven concluding for payment of certain sums. After negotiations between the parties, decree was, of consent, pronounced against Lord Ruthven on 4th December 1907 for the principal sum of £1379, 5s. 1d., and on 7th January 1908 for £24, 12s. 5d. of taxed expenses. Messrs Drummond extracted these decrees on 21st January 1908, and in virtue of these extracts, on 12th May 1908, they arrested in the hands of C. J. G. Paterson (who had succeeded Mr Auldjo Jamieson as a trustee) and A. R. C. Pitman the sum of £1600, more or less, due and addebted by them to, or held for behoof of, Lord Ruthven.

On 30th June 1908 Lord Ruthven presented a petition for recall of these arrestments on the ground that his interest in the funds arrested was purely alimentary, and not affectable by the diligence of his creditors. Answers to this petition were lodged for Messrs Drummond, in which they denied that the income of the trust fund payable to the petitioner was alimentary and not attachable by the diligence of his creditors, and explained that it was Lord Ruthven himself who obtained the authority of the Court to acquire, and did acquire, in fee-simple the entailed money, and that he thereafter placed the same in trust.

The case was heard before the First Division on 14th July 1908.

Argued for the petitioner;—It was clear ex facie of the agreement that none of the money settled here was really Lord Ruthven's. After Lord Ruthven's debts had been paid and the Master's expectancy had been provided for, Lord Ruthven's indebtedness to him carried off the whole of the rest of the disentailed money. The disentail could not have been effected without the Master's consent, and that consent was given on condition of this settlement of the Master's interest in the disentailed money. The money settled was therefore really the Master's money, and the settlement was really the deed of the Master, and consequently the provision for Lord Ruthven was validly restricted to an alimentary provision, and was not subject to arrestment.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The balance of the £30,000, after paying off the £9000 of debts, was in terms of the petition for disentail ex facie Lord Ruthven's own money, and as it was settled by him on himself, the declaration that it was alimentary was of no effect against the diligence of his creditors. That fact could not be displaced by speculations that the Master might have insisted, had he chosen to do so, on recovering a portion, or even the whole of it, July 14, 1908 in respect of his father's indebtedness to him. In any event, the alimentary restriction in the settlement on Lord Ruthven was ineffective, because there was embraced in it the reversion of the Irish property, the disposal of which was entirely under Lord Ruthven's own control, and could in no way be held to be a settlement by his son. Lord Ruthven v. Drummond.

(2) The form of process was incompetent for the settlement of the question raised here. A question of whether arrestments were validly laid on, which involved a question of right, could not be discussed and determined in a petition for recall. It could only be considered in a furthcoming.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition at the instance of Lord Ruthven for the recall of arrestments which have been laid on trust funds in the hands of Mr A. R. Pitman and Mr C. J. Paterson, who are the trustees acting under a certain deed. The reason alleged for the recall is that the funds held by these gentlemen, and payable to the petitioner, are alimentary funds. The answer made to that is, that although on the face of the deed they bear to be alimentary funds that is a bad description in law, for the funds truly belonged to the petitioner himself, and therefore he could not settle them on himself as an alimentary provision.

Now, we have the deed before us, and in the narrative the whole circumstances in which this money was settled and the trust created are set forth. The circumstances are these: Lord Ruthven came, on the death of Mary Elizabeth, Baroness Ruthven, his grandmother, to be the heir of entail in possession of the estate of Freeland. A portion of that estate was sold under the 1868 Act, which allows entailed lands to be sold to pay debts affecting the fee of the lands, and provides for the investment of any balance of the purchase price remaining after the debts have been paid, with the object of eventually reinvesting that balance in the purchase of land, and in the meantime of paying the annual proceeds of that money to the person who would have been heir of entail in possession but for the sale. The sale of this portion of Freeland having been effected and the debt paid, there remained a balance of £30,000. The agreement and trust-deed further narrated that Lord Ruthven was anxious to disentail this sum of £30,000, and I need scarcely remind your Lordships that there are provisions in the Entail Acts by which a petition to disentail can be made applicable to money in such a position. Now, Lord Ruthven was not in a position to disentail this money at his own hand, for he was born before 1848, but he could do so with the consent of his eldest son, the Master of Ruthven. The Master was willing to give his consent, but only on certain conditions. (I call attention to the fact that I am confining this narrative to what I find in gremio of the deed itself.) It was agreed that £12,000 was the value of the Master's expectancy in the £30,000, but Lord Ruthven also owed £9000 to outside creditors, and £11,000 to the Master himself, he having expended that sum in the payment of his father's debts. The deed goes on to provide for the disposal of the money set free by the

July 14, 1908. process of disentail, and it provides in the first place that £9000 should be immediately applied in payment of Lord Ruthven's debts, and then that the balance should be settled in a certain way. There are provisions for eventual annuities to Lady Ruthven and the younger children, but the rest of the money is practically settled to provide an alimentary liferent provision for Lord Ruthven.

Lord
Ruthven v.
Drummond.

Ld. President.

The sole question to be decided is, Whose money was so settled? If it was Lord Ruthven's money he could not, of course, create an alimentary liferent in favour of himself. But if it was his son's money the provision was good. In my opinion the money that was settled was the son's money; and I arrive at that result by a simple arithmetical process. To begin with, there was £30,000. £12,000 of that belonged to the Master as the value of his expectancy. That left £18,000, and of this £18,000 £9000 was paid to Lord Ruthven, for it was immediately paid over to his creditors, and thus was really paid to him, for his liabilities were reduced to that extent. That still left £9000 ostensibly for Lord Ruthven, but that sum was swallowed up by the debt of £11,000 which he still owed to the Master. Now, if the Master had chosen to exact payment of that sum he could have done so, and could have put it in his pocket and walked off with it; but if he preferred to put it in trust, along with the £12,000, he could settle that money in any way he chose, and one way was by settling it on his father by the creation of an alimentary liferent in his favour. Therefore, on the face of this deed, it appears to me that a perfectly proper alimentary liferent has been created.

Two little questions, however, remain which must not be left out of consideration. The first is that, besides this £30,000, there was also included in the property settled by this deed the reversion of a certain Irish estate; and Mr Fleming says that if that was of any value it upsets the calculation based on the figures I have given. That is certainly true, if it can be said there was substantially more included in this settlement than was the property of the Master. But if Mr Fleming had intended to say so he should have averred it, and there is no averment to that effect here. And I do not wonder that it has not been averred, for by the look of the deed I should suspect that there was very little surplus value in the Irish estate. However, Lord Ruthven cannot be called upon to prove a negative; and it was for the other parties to aver there was a substantial value in this Irish estate, if in reality any such value existed.

The other point is whether these matters are properly raised in a petition for the recall of arrestments, and an expression used by Lord Kinnear in the course of his opinion in the case of *Brand*¹ was founded on. I only point out that that expression must not be carried beyond the circumstances of the particular case with regard to which it was used, and I have nothing to add to what I said in this matter in the case of *Barclay, Curle, & Co.*² There is no doubt that the questions raised here could have been tried in a furthcoming, and if a furthcoming had been raised at once, I expect your Lordships would have been inclined to let the nexus remain until the furthcoming had been decided. But in this case these arrestments have remained on for a year, and what was the petitioner here to do? He could not raise July 14, 1908. a furthcoming himself, and he could not compel the creditors to do so, and Lord I think it would be very unfortunate if the law were as Mr Fleming, found- Ruthven v. ing on that expression of Lord Kinnear's, stated it to be, and if the petitioner Drummond. were to be deprived of this remedy. I therefore think that, when there is Ld. President. no furthcoming, the only plan is to consider the recall of the arrestments, and, for the reasons I have stated, I am of opinion that they should be recalled in this instance.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a petition for recall of arrestments, and I should be content to rest my judgment upon the clause in the deed which has been put before us, which provides that "as an essential part of the arrangements in terms of which I the said Master of Ruthven have consented to discharge my claim for compensation in respect of the disentail or acquisition in fee-simple of said trust fund and the said debts due to me by the said Lord Ruthven. . . . In the fourth place, that the said provision of income to the said Baron Ruthven and Lady Ruthven . . . shall be purely alimentary, and for the purpose above expressed, and shall not be affectable for or by the debts or deeds of the said Baron Ruthven and Lady Ruthven." The deed further provides that if from any cause the agreement could not be carried out, then the debts to the Master of Ruthven should immediately revive. I do not find a separate clause discharging the Master of Ruthven's claim, but nothing can be more clear than that he did discharge that claim, and that it was made a condition of the discharge that the fund which was available for the payment of that claim should be settled in liferent upon his father and mother. If that is not an alimentary provision made by the son, I do not see how it would be possible to create such a provision. The son might have taken the whole sum from his father and mother had he chosen to stand on his rights.

Then it is said that the addition of the Irish estate to the settled fund makes a difference. I am unable to agree with this contention. As regards the Irish property there is no averment on the record, and no expression in the deed, to shew that its inclusion contributed any material addition to the value of the fund.

I therefore think that the case for recall of the arrestments has been made out, because ex facie of the deed it appears that this is a good alimentary liferent provision, and one which is not prohibited by law.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur, and only desire to add that I entirely agree in all that your Lordship has said with regard to the case of Barclay, Curle, & Company.¹

LORD PEARSON was absent.

Napier's
Trustees v.
Napier.LAWRENCE TWENTYMAN NAPIER AND OTHERS (Robert Napier's Trustees), First Parties.—*Clark, K.C.—J. H. Millar.*MISS ELIZABETH MALCOLM NAPIER, Second Party.—*Murray.*MISS ISABEL NAPIER NAPIER AND OTHERS (Robert Assheton Napier's Sons and Daughters), Third Parties.—Macfarlane, K.C.—R. S. Brown.

Succession—Legacy—Accretion—Liferent.—A testator directed his trustees to hold a certain part of the residue of his estate "for behoof of my son John, his wife, and family, for alimentary use, not alienable or assignable or attachable for his or their debts (and afterwards to their issue in fee), and the annual proceeds arising therefrom to be paid quarterly to those entitled to receive the same."

After the death of John and his wife and of one of his two children, held that the bequest was a bequest of a joint liferent, and that John's surviving child was entitled to the liferent of the whole fund.

Per Lord M'Laren—"A bequest to a plurality of persons for life is in law a joint bequest, unless (1) there are words of severance, such as 'in equal shares,' or (2) the bequest is capable of being construed as a family provision under which the issue of each liferenter takes the parent's original share."

1ST DIVISION. ROBERT NAPIER, engineer and shipbuilder, Glasgow, died on 23d June 1876. By his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 14th April 1871, he directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate into ten shares, and gave directions as to their disposal, to which it is not necessary to refer.

By a letter or codicil addressed to his trustees, dated 18th January 1876, the testator directed, with regard to one of these shares—"I now direct and provide that five-tenths of this said tenth share shall be set aside and held by my trustees in trust for behoof of my son John, his wife, and family, for alimentary use, not alienable or assignable or attachable for his or their debts (and afterwards to their issue in fee), and the annual proceeds arising therefrom to be paid quarterly to those entitled to receive the same."

The five-tenths of a one-tenth share of the residue of the estate amounted to about £17,000.

The testator was survived by his son John, by the wife of his son John, and by their only children, Robert Assheton Napier and Elizabeth Malcolm Napier, both born before the date of the deed. During the lifetime of Mr John Napier, who died on 28th December 1899, the trustees paid to him the whole income of the £17,000. He was survived by his wife and daughter, but predeceased by his son Robert Assheton Napier, who died in 1894, survived by a family of sons and daughters. After the death of Mr John Napier, one-half of the income of the fund was, by arrangement, paid to his wife, and the other half to his daughter. On the death of Mrs John Napier in 1907, this arrangement came to an end, and questions arose regarding the disposal of the fund.

For the determination of these questions this special case was presented, to which the parties were (1) the testator Robert Napier's Trustees, (2) Miss Elizabeth Malcolm Napier, and (3) Robert Assheton Napier's children.

The contentions of the parties were set forth as follows:—

"The first parties contend that the fee of the one-half of the fund of £17,000, which half is admitted to be liferented by the second party, is in them in trust for her issue, whom failing, for the persons conditionally instituted to them in the settlement; or otherwise, that the fee of the whole fund is in them, and that the question to whom the fee ultimately goes cannot be decided till the death of the second July 14, 1908. party.

"The second party contends that she has a right to the liferent of the whole fund, and, in any event, to a liferent of one-half thereof. Napier's Trustees v. Napier.

"The third parties contend that they have right to the fee of the whole fund, subject to a liferent of one-half of the fund in favour of the second party, and defeasance quoad one-half of the fund in the event of her marrying and having children."

All parties were agreed that the second party was entitled, at least, to the liferent of one-half of the fund.

The case was heard on 20th June 1908.

The questions of law for the opinion and judgment of the Court were:—"(1) Is the party of the second part entitled to the liferent of the whole fund? or, (2) Is the party of the second part entitled to the liferent of only one-half of the fund? (3) Are the parties of the third part entitled to the fee of one-half of the fund absolutely? (4) Are the parties of the third part entitled to the fee of the whole fund, subject to the liferent of one-half thereof in favour of the party of the second part, and also subject to defeasance quoad one-half if the party of the second part marries and has children?"

Argued for the first parties;—The trustees were bound to hold the fund until the termination of the liferent. No decision could be given regarding the fee, as there was a destination over in favour of issue, which suspended vesting.¹ If the second party were found entitled only to the income of one-half of the fund, the trustees were bound to hold the remainder until it was ascertained to whom the fee was payable.

Argued for the second party, Miss Elizabeth M. Napier;—The bequest of the liferent was joint, and, on the death of the other members of the class, the surviving member took the lapsed shares by accretion. There were no words of severance to exclude accretion,² and in the case of a liferent provision accretion was presumed.³ No question as to the fee could be decided until Miss Napier's death.

Argued for the third parties, Mr Robert Assheton Napier's sons and daughters;—The destination "afterwards to their issue in fee" indicated the intention of the testator that on the death of each member of John's family, the fee of his or her share of the fund should vest in his or her issue. The third parties were accordingly entitled to immediate payment of one-half of the property. The liferent of this half was undisposed of,⁴ and belonged to the parties who were entitled to the fee. As regarded the other half, the fee had vested in the third parties, subject to defeasance in the event of the second party marrying and leaving issue.⁵

LORD M'LAREN.—The testator, Robert Napier, by his will or trust-deed

But by a codicil, in the form of a letter addressed to his testamentary trustees, dated 18th January 1876, the testator provided with reference to one of those ten shares "that five-tenths of this tenth share shall be set aside and held by my trustees in trust for behoof of my son John, his wife and family, for alimentary use, not alienable or assignable or attachable for his or their debts, and afterwards to their issue in fee." The subject of the bequest, one-twentieth of the residue of the testator's estate, is stated to amount to about £17,000.

Trustees v.
Napier.

Ld. M'Laren.

The testator was survived by his son John and his wife, and by their only children, Robert Assheton Napier and Elizabeth Malcolm Napier, both born, as I understand, before the date of the codicil. Robert Assheton Napier died in his father's lifetime, leaving issue, who are parties to this case. Miss Elizabeth Napier, also a party to the case, is unmarried.

I think it is reasonably certain that the bequest of one-twentieth of the estate to the testator's son John, his wife and family, was a bequest of the income for life, because (1) it is given for alimentary use, which is inconsistent with the notion of it being a bequest of a capital sum; (2) it was protected by a special trust; and (3) the fee was destined to the issue of the first takers, a provision which would be unmeaning if the fee had already been given away under the first member of the clause of bequest.

I also consider it to be reasonably clear that the life interest constituted by this bequest was of the nature of a joint liferent.

A bequest to a plurality of persons for life is in law a joint bequest unless (1) there are words of severance such as "in equal shares," or (2) the bequest is capable of being construed as a family provision under which the issue of each liferenter takes the parent's original share.

Now, this gift of one-twentieth of Mr Napier's estate does not satisfy either of the exceptions which I have indicated, and I know of no others. It must therefore be treated as a joint bequest. This is no doubt a somewhat anomalous provision under which a mother and daughter take the income of the fund concurrently; but the testator apparently considered this to be a good scheme for making provision against misfortune or want, and it must be remembered that the fund in question was only a small fraction of Mr Napier's estate, and was intended to be a safe provision under all contingencies.

Now, Miss Elizabeth Napier is the last survivor of the parties interested in this provision for life, and as it is a joint bequest, it follows that this lady is entitled to the income of the entire fund for the remaining years of her life.

As regards the destination of the capital of the £17,000, I do not think that we are in a position to give a decision. If we were in the region of theory, I should not have much doubt that the capital was divisible amongst the children of John Napier and the children of Elizabeth (if she were married) per capita. It may be that when the time for division of the capital arrives there will be no dispute, but if there should be a dispute, we have not before us all the parties who may be interested in it, and are therefore not in a position to give an effective decision. I therefore propose that we should answer the first question in the affirmative, and make no answer to the third and fourth questions.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion, and for the reasons which July 14, 1908, Lord M'Laren has given. I think this must be read as a joint liferent to the testator's son John, his wife, and family, and therefore that the last survivor is now entitled to the whole liferent. I think on that decision being reached that it would be altogether premature to decide the questions which are raised as to the fee, because we cannot tell what conflicting interests may emerge when the liferent determines, or who the parties interested may be. We were told that it would be at least simple and safe to decide that the third parties were entitled to the fee, subject to the liferent, and subject to defeasance quoad one-half in the event of the second party marrying and having children. But we do not know whether such children, if they come into existence, may be advised to claim a half or some other share of the fee. Lord M'Laren points out that there might be a question whether the fee was divisible between the two families per capita or per stirpes, and we cannot tell before the event whether it will be for the interest of children yet unborn to maintain one view or the other of that question. We ought not to pronounce a judgment which will not be res judicata against all the persons who may come to be interested in the matter.

LORD M'LAREN intimated that LORD ARDWALL, who was present at the hearing but absent at the advising, had authorised him to say that he concurred in Lord M'Laren's opinion.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent at the hearing.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and refused to answer the third and fourth questions.

Trade-Mark—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 28), sec. 2, subsec. (2)—Applying false trade description—Acting innocently.—H. M. Advocate v. Suits, Limited.
The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, sec. 2 (2), enacts,—“Every person who sells, or exposes for, or has in his possession for, sale, or any purpose of trade or manufacture, any goods or things to which any forged trade-mark or false trade description is applied, or to which any trade-mark or mark so nearly resembling a trade-mark as to be calculated to deceive is falsely applied, as the case may be, shall,—unless he proves (a) that having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this Act, he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark, mark, or trade description, and (b) that on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods or things, or (c) that otherwise he had acted innocently,—be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

A person acting at the instigation of a Procurator-fiscal wrote to the July 16, 1908. Glasgow branch of a firm of clothiers, asking for patterns of "Scotch Tweed" waterproofs, and saying,—“What I want is a good serviceable coat, all wool.” The firm wrote, enclosing patterns “as requested.” One of these patterns which did not answer to the trade description, “Scotch Tweed All Wool,” was chosen, and the firm supplied a coat of the material selected. It appeared that the firm’s assistants were enjoined not to give goods any description other than that by which they were invoiced to the branch. The material in question was invoiced to the branch as “overcoating,” and by the rules of the business the firm’s salesmen were permitted to supply it only under the name of “overcoating.”

In a complaint at the instance of the Board of Trade, on which the above facts were proved, the Sheriff-substitute assoltized the respondents.

In an appeal upon a stated case, held (per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Low, and Lord Ardwall) that the trade description “Scotch Tweed All Wool” had not been applied to the material in question, and (per the Court), that even if the trade description “Scotch Tweed All Wool” had been applied to the material, the respondents had acted innocently in the sense of sec. 2, subsec. (2).

Observations (per Lord Low and Lord Ardwall) on the conduct incumbent upon persons seeking evidence against offenders by making purchases for this purpose.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

THE firm of “Suits, Limited,” 163 Trongate, Glasgow, were charged in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow on a summary complaint at the instance of the Lord Advocate, which set forth that the accused “did, between 18th November and 11th December 1907, in their warehouse at 163 Trongate, Glasgow, sell to Thomas Steven, clerk, 39 Fort Street, Ayr, a waterproof coat to which the false trade description ‘Scotch Tweed All Wool’ was applied, contrary to the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, and particularly section 2, subsection (2).”*

On 1st April 1908 the Sheriff-substitute (Glegg) assoltized the accused.

The complainer took an appeal by way of a stated case, which set forth that the following facts were proved:—“The communications between the parties were conducted entirely by writing. Throughout the whole proceedings Steven was acting at the instigation and under the direction of the Ayr Procurator-fiscal. The respondents acted through their servants at their branch in Glasgow. On 18th November 1907 Steven wrote to the respondents:—‘I am told you supply Scotch tweed waterproofs for 20s. to measure; and as I want one, would you please send me patterns. I fancy you can give me directions for measuring myself, so that I would not need to go to Glasgow. What I want is a good serviceable coat, all wool, and fit to turn rain. . . . On 19th November the respondents replied:—‘Enclosed please find patterns as requested. Trusting you will be able to make a favourable selection.’ . . . Various patterns were enclosed, but of what material these, other than that chosen, were composed does not appear. On 29th November Steven wrote:—‘I got the patterns of Scotch tweed waterproof, which you sent in answer to my letter of 18th November. I have selected one I enclose.’ . . . The pattern selected was one which Steven and his advisers, after examination, believed not to be Scotch tweed. The coat supplied was made from cloth of this pattern. . . . The respondents sent the coat and an invoice, bearing,—

* The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 28), sec. 2, subsec. (2), is quoted in the rubric.

'Overcoat £1,' to which was annexed a receipt as follows :—'Received July 16, 1908. of Mr Steven the sum of One pound.' On 12th December 1907 Steven wrote,—'The waterproof is to hand. I would like to have a duplicate receipt for its price; so please sign the enclosed receipt, and return in the enclosed stamped envelope.' The form referred to bore :—'Duplicate.—Received from Thomas Steven, Fort Street, Ayr, One pound in payment of all wool Scotch Tweed Waterproof supplied to him.' On 18th December 1907, Steven wrote :—'I sent you on 12th a form of duplicate receipt for the price of the waterproof I got from you, but I have not received it back. In case it has gone amissing, I enclose a fresh receipt, and I shall be obliged by your signing it and returning it to me.' This form was the same as the previous one. On 19th December 1907, the respondents wrote :—'Re your letter to hand. Enclosed please find copy of your receipt. Received from Mr T. Steven the sum of £1 in payment of overcoat supplied to him.' 'Scotch Tweed All Wool' by the definition received in the trade requires that the article shall be made of material spun and woven in Scotland, and be composed wholly of wool, except for a small percentage, about 2 per cent, of foreign matter. The coat supplied contained 20.51 per cent of cotton."

H. M. Advocate v. Suits, Limited.

The case further bore,—"I held that (1) 'Scotch Tweed All Wool' is a trade description; (2) the coat supplied was not 'Scotch Tweed All Wool'; (3) it was not proved that the respondents sold to Steven a coat to which the trade description 'Scotch Tweed All Wool' was applied within the meaning of section 2, subsection (2), of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. I also found that if I had held that said trade description was applied, that the respondents had acted innocently within the meaning of section 2, subsection 2 (c), of the Act. The respondents' servants were enjoined not to give goods any description other than that by which they were invoiced to the Glasgow branch. At the said branch there were supplied forms which required that the description of the goods should be marked on the forms in the same way as the goods themselves were entered in the stock-book, which had to be made up from invoices received from headquarters. When a piece was separated from the bulk to make the overcoat in question, it was ticketed with a form on which the description was repeated. The material in this case was invoiced by the respondents to the said branch as overcoating No. 294, and this number was repeated on the forms mentioned and in the stock-book. Under the rules of the respondents' business, it was only under the name of 'overcoating' that it was permissible for the respondents' salesmen to supply it."

The questions of law were :—"(1) Did the respondents sell to Steven a coat to which the trade description 'Scotch Tweed All Wool' was applied within the meaning of and contrary to section 2, subsection (2), of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887? (2) Was the trade description 'Scotch Tweed All Wool' applied to the coat sold by the respondents to Steven within the meaning of section 2, subsection (2), of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887? (3) Did the respondents act innocently within the meaning of section 2, subsection 2 (c), of the Act?"

The case was heard before the Second Division on 16th July 1908.

Argued for the complainer and appellant ;—(1) The trade description "Scotch Tweed All Wool" had been applied to the goods in question. It was explicitly stated that the buyer had got what he

July 16, 1908. ordered. *Lord Advocate v. Jacob*¹ was distinguishable. The order here was unambiguous. In Jacob's case¹ there was ambiguity. (2) The respondents had not acted innocently. They had not taken all possible precautions. They had not appointed anybody to see that the rules referred to in the case were observed. Mere general directions were not enough.²

H. M. Advocate v. Suita, Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—No doubt it was not necessary for the prosecutor to prove a mens rea.³ But the accused was entitled to acquittal if he could prove that the mens rea was not present, the onus being on him.⁴ Here the Sheriff had found in fact that the accused had acted innocently, and his judgment ought not to be disturbed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As regards the first point in the case, namely, whether a technical offence was committed under the section, I think that this is not so strong a case for the prosecution as the case of Jacob.¹ In this case I should have much more difficulty in holding that anything was proved which amounted to a contravention. But this case admits of being decided on the second question. The Sheriff-substitute has found as matter of fact that the respondents in this case acted innocently in the sense of section 2, subsection 2 (c), of the Act. I must say in dealing with an Act of Parliament like this in which the onus of proof is placed on the accused, I should require a very strong case before I would reverse the judgment of the Sheriff and hold the accused guilty. Apart from that I think the Sheriff was right. We are dealing with a case in which under an Act of Parliament an employer may be made criminally responsible for the unauthorised act of his servant. I think that we ought to be very cautious in applying an enactment of that kind. The judgment of the Sheriff appears to me to be right, and I would propose that the appeal be dismissed.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I did not take part in the judgment in the case of Jacob,¹ and although I do not suggest for a moment that that judgment is unsound or even doubtful, I should prefer not to express any opinion on the first point in this case. On the second point, which is sufficient for its decision, I am clear that the Sheriff-substitute has come to a right conclusion.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. On the first part of the case I think that it is plain that no offence under the Act was proved, and it is unnecessary to go into details.

I should, however, like to say a word as to the method employed in getting up a case against the respondent. It is no doubt legitimate, and indeed may be necessary if the statute is to be enforced, for a Procurator-fiscal to employ a person to make a fictitious purchase, but although that is quite allowable, everything ought to be done in a straightforward manner, and the article desired ought to be asked for unambiguously. Here the whole correspondence seems to me to have been calculated, if it was not July 16, 1908. designed, to mislead. What the writer said, in his first letter, was that he wanted a Scotch tweed waterproof, and although he did, in a subsequent part of the letter, introduce the expression "all wool," he did so only incidentally, and it is not surprising that what was sent in reply to the letter was the kind of tweed which is used for making waterproof coats. I confess that it seems to me that the letters were from beginning to end an unfair attempt to entrap the tradesman to whom they were addressed.

On the second part of the case, I accept the law as laid down in the case of Coppen v. Moore,¹ to the effect that an employer may, in a question whether an offence under the statute has been committed, be responsible for the unauthorised actions of his servant, but while accepting that doctrine, I agree with your Lordship in the chair that it must be applied with great care. In this case I think that the facts justified the Sheriff-substitute in holding that the respondent acted innocently.

LORD ARDWALL.—Undoubtedly it is a very important matter that adulteration of Scotch tweeds, or any other textile fabric, should be prevented, and it is quite right that the authorities should take steps to bring to justice persons who make or traffic in adulterated goods; but I agree with my brother Lord Low, that in taking the necessary steps everything should be done in a straightforward manner—there should be a straightforward demand for a specific description of goods, about which there could be no ambiguity whatsoever. Of course, traps must be laid in cases of this sort, but I quite concur with what has been said about this and the other case decided in the Justiciary Court this morning,² that in such cases the correspondence was an attempt to force the accused into giving a wrong description of the goods sold, and to make him admit, by his own writing, after the sale had taken place, that he was guilty of an offence. Very properly the accused refused to commit himself to a description of an article which he had not supplied. I agree, therefore, for the reasons stated by Lord Low, that neither the first nor second question can be answered in the affirmative.

In regard to the third question, I agree that the Sheriff was right in holding the accused "innocent" within the meaning of section 2, subsection (2) (c). The precautions taken by them seem to have been most reasonable, and, so far as I can see, sufficient. I am accordingly of opinion on this ground also, that the Sheriff-substitute was right in holding that an offence under section 2, subsection (2), has not been committed by the accused.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first and second questions of law therein stated in the negative, and the third in the affirmative: Find and declare accordingly; and decern: Find the respondents entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court."

July 16, 1908. BOWRING & COMPANY, Defenders and Claimants (Reclaimers).—

Sol.-Gen. Ure—R. S. Horne.

Clark v.
Bowring & Co.

Foreign—Jurisdiction—Contract—Lex loci or lex fori—Maritime lien—Expenditure on British ship in foreign port.—In a process in Scotland for the judicial sale of a British ship, then lying in a Scottish port, warrant for sale was granted, and the ship was sold. A claim for a preferential ranking on the purchase price was lodged in the process by a New York firm, who alleged that by American law they had a good lien over the ship for certain expenditure incurred by them on her account while she was lying at New York.

Held that the question whether any claimants in the process had a lien over the ship fell to be determined by Scots law, and not by American law.

Ship—Maritime lien—Seamen's wages—Payment by third party—Acquisition of lien by third party—Acquisition without written assignation—Payments not made on credit of the ship.—The owners of a British ship, which was in need of repairs, requested a firm of shipbrokers in New York to give assistance to the ship on her arrival at New York. On the arrival of the ship the firm of shipbrokers expended a considerable sum on repairs and necessities and also paid the seamen's wages. These payments were put together in a lump sum, and the owners accepted a bill for the amount, but the bill was not met at maturity. The owners having become bankrupt, the ship, which was then in Scotland, was sold by warrant of the Court. The New York firm claimed a preferential ranking on the purchase price in respect of their disbursements for seamen's wages, on the ground that the lien for seamen's wages had transmitted to them.

Held (1) that a lien for seamen's wages transmits to the payer without a formal assignation if the payment is made on the credit of the ship; but (2) that, in the circumstances of this case, the payments had been made on the credit of the owners and not of the ship, and that consequently the payer had acquired no lien.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Salvesen.

ON 25th November 1907 an action for declarator and sale of the s.s. "Abbey Holme," registered at Maryport in England, but then lying at the port of Greenock, was brought in the Court of Session at the instance of Robert Clark, shipowner, Glasgow, as representing the master and certain members of the crew of the vessel, and as an individual, and at the instance of the master himself. The registered owner of the "Abbey Holme" was Wilfred Hine, shipowner, Maryport, a partner of the firm of Hine Brothers, shipowners there, who had along with his firm granted a trust-deed for behoof of creditors. The parties called as defenders to the action were Wilfred Hine, the firm of Hine Brothers, the trustee acting under the trust-deed, certain parties holding mortgages over the vessel, and also the firm of Bowring & Company of New York, who had incurred certain expenses in connection with the vessel when she was in America. The pursuers set forth debts due to them amounting in all to £2093, 2s. 7d., for which they averred that they had a lien over the vessel, and they asked that she should be sold under warrant of the Court for the purpose of paying these debts.

Defences were lodged for Bowring & Company in which, besides denying that the pursuers had any lien over the vessel, they averred with regard to their own claim:—"Explained that the said steamship arrived at New York in or about 5th December 1906 in a damaged and unseaworthy condition, making it absolutely necessary that she

the owners on the credit of the ship to have it put into a seaworthy ^{Clark v.} condition, and in connection with the requisite repairs, in the supply ^{Bowring & Co.} of necessaries to the ship, and in payment of wages then due to the crew amounting to 848 dollars, they expended a sum of 36,162 dollars. The supply of said repairs and necessaries was completed in or about the beginning of February 1907, and the sum due to the repairers and suppliers was paid by these defenders on 15th February 1907. The remainder of said sum of 36,162 dollars was expended by these defenders on or before said date. But for the supply of said repairs and necessaries by these defenders the ship would have been unfit to proceed. It was in reliance upon the credit of the ship that these defenders agreed to supply the funds for paying the crew and for furnishing the ship with necessaries and repairs, and in respect thereof they have a maritime lien upon the ship. Further, said agreement for supplying said funds was made in New York and the rights incident to it fall to be determined according to the maritime law of the United States and the law of New York State. By these systems of law these defenders have a maritime lien upon the ship in respect of the sums expended by them in said repairs and necessaries, as well as in paying the wages of the crew. Moreover, said agreement being made in the United States and subject to its laws, it was an implied term of it that these defenders should under any circumstances have the benefit of the lien recognised by American law. In drawing upon the owners of said ship for the amount expended by them these defenders did not relinquish any of their rights over the ship. . . . The said sums were expended by these defenders prior to any of the obligations founded on by the pursuers being incurred, and the rights of these defenders in respect thereof are preferable to those of the pursuers or the mortgagees. A sale of the ship would injuriously affect the just rights of these defenders." For the amount of Bowring & Company's claim, viz., 36,162 dollars, Hine Brothers had accepted a bill drawn on them by Bowring & Company, which matured on 3d May 1907, but on that date Bowring & Company arranged to give further delay, and Hine Brothers accepted a new bill which matured on 5th July 1907.
When that bill fell due it was dishonoured.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers, or one or other of them, in virtue of the writs libelled, having a maritime lien or hypothec over the said steamship, and being entitled to make their lien or hypothec effectual by a sale thereof, decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (3) The comparing defenders not having a maritime lien over the said steamship in respect of the disbursements made by them, the defences should be repelled, with expenses.

The comparing defenders pleaded;—(3) Neither of the pursuers having any valid lien over said vessel, the action ought to be dismissed. (4) These defenders having, on the credit of the ship, expended sums on repairs and necessaries for said ship, et separatim on payment of wages of the crew then due prior to 15th February 1907, they have a valid maritime lien over said vessel preferable to any alleged lien of the pursuers. (5) Separatim, these defenders having, according to the maritime law of the United States, and the law of New York State, by which the question falls to be determined, a maritime lien over the vessel in respect of said sums expended on July 16, 1908. necessities for said vessel, et separatim on the wages of the crew then due, they have a claim prior in date and preferable to that of either of the pursuers. (6) In respect of these defenders' rights in said vessel, the pursuers are not entitled, in violation thereof, to have the vessel sold until the defenders' claims are discharged.

Clark v.
Bowring & Co.

On 25th January 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) pronounced an interlocutor, finding that the pursuers, or one or other of them, had a maritime lien over the "Abbey Holme," and granting warrant of sale as craved, and finding the compearing defenders liable in the expenses occasioned by their compearance.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The compearing defenders are a corporation recognised and existing under the laws of the State of New York. They narrate that, on 5th December 1906, the 'Abbey Holme' arrived at New York in a damaged and unseaworthy condition, which made it necessary that she should go into dry dock for repairs; that they contracted with the owners to have her put into a seaworthy condition, and paid the ship-builder's account for repairs, and made other disbursements on behalf of the steamer. For those disbursements they drew a bill of exchange on Hine Brothers—the managing owners—dated 19th February 1907. This bill matured on 3d May, and on that day Messrs C. T. Bowring & Company, Limited, arranged to give further delay; and in lieu of the bill which had matured, they in their own name drew on Messrs Hine Brothers for the same amount. The bill was duly accepted, but was dishonoured when it became due on 5th July 1907. The compearing defenders say that they relied upon the credit of the ship in making these advances; and that, according to the maritime law of the United States, and of New York State in particular, they have a maritime lien upon the ship in respect of the sums expended by them on said repairs and necessities. At the debate they did not maintain that, according to the law of Scotland or the general maritime law of Great Britain, they could maintain the claim of lien; and as I can only apply our own law in determining the ranking of claims on a British ship, locally situated in Scotland, they must be treated as unsecured creditors of the bankrupt owner.

"These defenders have an obvious interest in resisting a judicial sale, for if the vessel were to go to an American port they would be able to enforce their alleged lien against her there, and that possibly notwithstanding that she might have changed hands under a private sale. If, on the other hand, the vessel is sold judicially, and declared by decree of this Court 'to pertain and belong to the purchaser, freed and disburdened of all bonds, mortgages, liens, rights of retention, and other incumbrances affecting the same,' in terms of the fifth conclusion of the summons, they are apprehensive—and I think with good reason—that the maritime lien which is said to exist in their favour in America might be completely destroyed. Hence their anxiety to prevent a judicial sale taking place. . . .

"In my opinion the compearing defenders have no title to defend. On their own statement of the facts it is plain that they are merely unsecured creditors of Hine Brothers—or of the registered owner, Mr Wilfrid Hine, for whom the firm acted as managers. As such they are represented by the trustee in bankruptcy, Mr Mounsey. It is said that Mr Mounsey has no interest to object to a sale, because the prior mortgages are so large as to more than absorb the estimated value of the ship; and that the defenders have the interest which I have already adverted to. That, however, in my opinion, does not entitle them to take up a position which the trustee—who represents the interests of the general body of unsecured creditors—regards as untenable. They are no doubt called as defenders in the present action, but that is because they claimed at one time to have a maritime lien, and in that view had an obvious interest to oppose the claims of the pursuers to a lien which

The ship was thereupon sold by public roup in Glasgow, and the purchase price consigned in bank in the name of the Accountant of Court, and on 29th February 1908 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor appointing all parties claiming an interest in the consigned fund to lodge claims. Claims were accordingly lodged for the pursuers, for the mortgagees, and for Bowring & Company, and a new record made up in the competition.

July 16, 1908.
Clark v.
Bowring & Co.

Bowring & Company in their claim averred as follows:—

“In or about the end of September 1906 they (the claimants) were notified by Hine Brothers, shipowners, Maryport, that a vessel belonging to the said Hine Brothers, called the ‘Abbey Holme,’ had been receiving temporary repairs in the Straits of Magellan, and that she was expected in a short period thereafter to arrive at New York. The claimants were not the regular agents of the said Hine Brothers, nor of the said ship, but Hine Brothers requested the claimants to advise the master with regard to the noting of a protest, and the signing of average bonds. They further informed the claimants, at a later date, that they had decided to send out their superintendent, Captain George Brown, to attend to the interests of the ship, and they requested the claimants to give him such assistance as they could in making any necessary arrangements for its survey. The said superintendent thereafter duly arrived.

“The ‘Abbey Holme’ reached New York on 5th December 1906, when it was discovered that it would be necessary to put her into dry dock for the purpose of undergoing extensive repairs. The question of the necessary repairs was gone into and decided upon by the superintendent of Hine Brothers, and the ship was thereafter dry-docked, and the requisite repairs duly executed by the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry-Dock Company, at a cost of 32,860 dollars. These claimants, at the request of Messrs Hine Brothers, made the contract with the Newport News Company for the said repairs, and when the sum fell due, they, on 15th February 1907, paid the amount of the said account to the Newport News Company. These claimants also, prior to that date, expended other sums on the supply of necessities to the said ship, and they paid wages then due to the crew to an amount of 848 dollars or £176, 13s. 2d. In all they thus expended a sum of 36,162 dollars or £7537, 15s. 8d.

“But for the supply of said repairs and necessities the ship would have been unable to proceed on her voyage to England, as she was in an unseaworthy condition at the time when she arrived in New York. In expending said sums for said ship these claimants were acting according to the regular custom of shipping houses in the city of New might take priority of theirs. It having now turned out that they cannot maintain any lien—according to the law which I am bound to administer—they are in no better position than any of the other creditors of Mr Hine, who must be taken to be fully represented by the assignee in bankruptcy. On that ground alone I would be prepared to repel their defences, and to proceed in this action thereafter as if it were undefended.

“The same result follows if I hold that the pursuers have in fact a maritime lien for all or any of the sums in respect to which the claim is made. [His Lordship then stated his reasons for holding that the pursuers were entitled to have the vessel judicially sold.] I shall accordingly grant a decree in terms of the fifth conclusion of the action—leaving to the pursuers to establish the specific amounts to which they are entitled to be ranked in the competition which will follow.”

July 16, 1908. York, and in doing so they were relying on the credit of the ship. In respect and to the amount of said disbursements and the amount paid for the wages of the crew, they acquired a maritime lien upon the ship, both according to the rule of English law and that of the maritime law of the United States of America.

Clark v.
Bowring & Co.

"Further, the agreement made by these claimants with Hine Brothers for the supply of said necessities and said funds was made in New York, and the rights incident to it fall to be determined according to the maritime laws of the United States of America. According to that law it is presumed that a person making repairs and furnishing supplies to a foreign ship looks to the credit of the ship, and he obtains a maritime lien over the vessel for such supplies and repairs. By said law also a person who advances funds for the purpose of settling accounts for such repairs and supplies has the same right of lien that the repairer and supplier himself has, and is surrogated to all the rights and remedies of the person whose claim he has paid."

They claimed a preferable ranking for £7537, 15s. 8d. or in any event, for £176, 13s. 2d., and pleaded, inter alia;—(1) These claimants having, on the credit of the ship, expended sums on repairs and necessities for said ship, and on payment of wages to the crew then due prior to 15th February 1907, they have a valid maritime lien over said vessel, and are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim. (2) Separatim, these claimants having, according to the maritime law of the United States of America, by which the question falls to be determined, a maritime lien over the said vessel in respect of sums expended on necessities for said vessel and the wages of the crew then due, they are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim.

The claim for the pursuers contained the following averment with regard to Bowring & Company:—"The sole claim of Messrs Bowring & Company, if any, is a personal one against Messrs Hine Brothers, or Mr Wilfrid Hine, the registered owner of the vessel, who have granted an assignment for behoof of creditors in favour of Mr William Edward Mounsey, chartered accountant, Liverpool. . . . Messrs Bowring & Company are shipbrokers in New York, and were Messrs Hine Brothers' agents there. The 'Abbey Holme' was a British vessel registered at Maryport, and the fund in medio is the price of the said vessel deposited in the name of the Accountant of Court after a sale conducted at Glasgow by order of the Court of Session, pronounced while the 'Abbey Holme' was lying in the harbour at Greenock. The order of ranking of the claims upon the said vessel, and all questions incident thereto, accordingly fall to be decided by the maritime laws of Great Britain and the law of Scotland."

They pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The claim of the claimants Bowring & Company should be repelled, in respect . . . (b) that the claim for said claimants Bowring & Company is irrelevant and untenable in law; (c) that said claimants have no maritime or other lien or preferable right over the said steamship, or the proceeds of sale thereof, in respect of the disbursements in question. Similar averments and pleas with regard to Bowring & Company's claim were stated by the other claimants.

On 13th June 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) pronounced an interlocutor finding that the claim for the claimants Bowring & Company was irrelevant and untenable in law, and ranking the other claimants in terms of their claims, and also finding Bowring & Company liable to the other claimants in the expenses of the competition.

Clark v.
Bowring & Co.

Bowring & Company reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 16th July 1908.

Argued for the claimants and reclaimers;—(1) The reclaimers had a good lien over the ship for the whole of their expenditure on her behalf, because by the law of New York such a lien was established, and this contract must be interpreted by the law of New York. There were no circumstances here to prevent the application of the general maxim that a contract must be interpreted by the lex loci contractus and the lex loci actus, and applying that maxim here the principles of the law of New York must be held to be embodied in this contract. (2) In any event, the reclaimers had a good lien for the amount of seamen's wages paid by them. A seaman had a lien over the ship for his wages, and in default of payment he might arrest the ship. That lien transmitted to the person relieving the ship by paying the wages, and it transmitted automatically without the necessity for any formal assignation.¹ The fact that the reclaimers had been in communication with the owners did not negative the presumption that they had made this payment on the credit of the ship. The analogy of a bottomry bond, or a payment made under contract, did not apply, for the lien claimed here was one which did not arise ex contractu but arose ex lege. Even a bottomry bond could be entered into by the agent for the owners.² The fact that this was a payment of a past due debt distinguished it from payments incurred for fresh expenses, before incurring which a master might be bound to obtain, if possible, the sanction of the owners.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) (The Court intimated that they required no argument on the first point.) (2) There was no lien in the pursuers for the wages they had paid. To create such a lien there must be some form of assignation.³ In the cases relied on by the reclaimers this point was not raised, and the reports did not establish that there was not some form of mandate or assignation.⁴ The seamen had a lien for their wages, and this payment was for the purpose of relieving the ship of that lien. It would not do so if the lien were merely transferred, and such floating securities as maritime liens were inconvenient, and based on necessity only, and were not lightly to be presumed. Further, the master had no power in this case to pledge the credit of the ship. A master, where there was communication with the owners as here, had no power at his own hand to grant a bond of bottomry.⁵ Similarly he could not at his own hand subject his vessel to a lien by requesting a third party to pay seamen's wages. In any event, a lien could only come into existence if the expenditure was incurred on the credit of the ship. Here, on the face of the

The reclaimers were in communication with the owners the whole time, and took a bill for the amount of their expenditure, and afterwards renewed it.¹ These facts were utterly inconsistent with the view that they had made the payments on the credit of the ship and not of the owners.

Clark v.
Bowring & Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a competition upon the price of a ship that was sold at Glasgow. The claimants who are preferred are claimants who have a maritime lien on the ship, and are also mortgagees. The competing claimants are an American firm who paid certain moneys in New York during the voyage of the ship, and who in respect of these payments allege that they have a maritime lien which entitles them to be ranked pari passu with the other claimants here. Now, the position of these claimants in respect of their advances is different in respect of one portion of the money and of another. In respect of very much the largest sum they claim, they aver, and offer to prove, that by the law which would apply in the American Court in New York they have a good maritime lien. That is denied by the other claimants, but for the purposes of this argument we must hold that it could be proved as a matter of fact. But it is admitted by both sides of the Bar that according to the maritime law applied in this country there is no maritime lien for these particular sums. That being so, I think the Lord Ordinary was perfectly right when he practically disposed of this matter in a sentence in his first judgment where he said—"I can only apply our own law in determining the ranking of claimants on a British ship, locally situated in Scotland, and they (that is, these claimants) must be treated as unsecured creditors of the bankrupt owner." I think that is really too clear for argument, and Mr Horne, I am afraid, could not produce any authority on the point, nor could he appeal to any principle. It seems to me perfectly clear that the question of whether there is a good lien upon a ship must be determined by the Court where the question arises, and must be determined according to the local law, having regard to the flag of the ship and also to the forum in which the question is being raised. I think that so much was determined in terms by Mr Justice Phillimore in the case of *The "Tagus,"*² which has been cited to us. It is impossible by contract to impose a local law of New York—which ex hypothesi is different from the general maritime law of the world as applied in our Courts—it is impossible to impose that law in our Courts when the ship comes to our shores.

But the other advances are in a different position. They are advances of £176 odds, which were disbursed in payment of seamen's wages. Now there is no question that by the maritime law, as applied in our Courts, there is a good lien for seamen's wages. There is no question that that lien can be assigned. The question is whether these parties are in right of this lien? We had two questions argued to us. It was first argued by the competing claimants here at home that there could be no good lien without an actual written assignation. I am not inclined to assent to that doctrine. On the contrary, I think the contrary seems to be the case. It seems to me quite clear from the report in the case of *The "St Lawrence,"*¹ that there July 16, 1908.

 was no assignation in that case, and I think the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore in a single sentence excludes the idea. He is talking of parti-^{Clark v.}
 cular claims, and he says—"It is true that pilotage and towage claims are ^{Bowring & Co.} not mentioned by Dr Lushington in the case of *The 'William F. Safford'*² ^{Ld. President.} as claims which, if paid by a third party, confer any priority on the person so paying them; but the reason of that decision applies to such claims, and indeed I do not understand it to be disputed that a person who discharges claims of that character has the same rights and remedies for their recovery as the person to whom the money has been paid." That, I think, would be a singularly inaccurate statement if it were true that an actual assignation was needed, and I think the same thing is said by Mr Justice Phillimore in the case of *The "Tagus,"*³ where he says—"If the whole disbursements are, as apparently they are, payments of wages to the crew, who might have seized the ship, then I think that the doctrine that the man who has paid the privileged claims stands in the shoes of the privileged claimant should be applied, and he has a lien for any disbursements made, although he was not master, in payment of the wages of the crew." Accordingly, in that case, where there was obviously no assignation, the person claiming, who had been a mere supercargo at the time he paid the wages, but who had not taken any document of assignation from the sailors, was ranked and preferred for any sums which he had disbursed for the ship while he was supercargo in payment of the crew's wages. But I entirely concur with what Mr Dickson said, that what is at the bottom of this doctrine is that you must shew that the payment was made in reliance upon the credit of the ship. And no doubt in an ordinary case that would be shewn by the mere fact of the payments having been made. It is, of course, a common case. The master arrives at a port without money to pay his seamen's wages, and it being the fact that the seamen are then in a position to seize the ship, the master goes to a shipbroker or anyone else and gets him to pay the seamen's wages, and it is plain from the mere fact of payment that that person will rely upon the credit of the ship and not upon the credit of the master, who is probably a person whose credit is of very little worth. That always leaves behind the question of fact, and when you come to the facts of this case it seems clear that this payment of £176 was not made in reliance upon the credit of the ship. The ship had been in difficulties in the southern seas before it got to New York, and the owners had written to these shipbrokers in New York saying that their ship had been in difficulties and asking them to see to it on its arrival at New York. They undertook the agency, and that being so, they paid the repairers' bills and also seamen's wages, and they massed the whole of the sums which they paid in one account, and for that account bills were granted, and these bills, when they came to maturity, were renewed, and we should never have heard anything about this question of lien had the shipowners not gone bankrupt, so that the renewal bills were not met at maturity. All that shews that these disbursements were not made in reliance upon any maritime lien at all, but in reliance on the owners, who

July 16, 1908. had requested these claimants to make these advances. That being so, I think that the claim upon the £176 falls, and accordingly I think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment remains undisturbed, and that we should adhere to it.

Clark v.

Bowring & Co.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. The first question appears to be really too clear to require argument in its support. The determination of how a security is to be constituted no doubt depends upon territorial law, and if this had been an immoveable subject we should of course have gone to the sources of American law to ascertain whether the security required writing for its constitution, or whether it could subsist without writing as a lien. But then, in the case of a ship, a ship has no territory, or rather its territory is the whole world—any shore to which it is capable of being navigated; and therefore in order to constitute a security independent of written title, it is necessary that the lien or right should be recognised by the general maritime law of the world. It may be that as regards coast traffic the United States of America would be able to enforce the law peculiar to their own country, because they have the ship subject to their jurisdiction. The same thing might happen if a foreign ship should arrive in America and should be sold there. It would be for the Courts to determine whether they would apply their own law or the general maritime law. I think that the present question must be ruled by the general maritime law, and consequently that the claim fails.

On the question of the seamen's wages I agree with your Lordship that there is no conclusive authority to the effect that a formal assignation is necessary where an advance of wages is made at the request of the captain or crew, and in reliance on the right of lien which they have under maritime law. In certain cases, no doubt, a person who advances money must be able to produce an assignation of the right, but even in such a case the rule has been much relaxed; because, for instance, in the case of cautionary obligations, if the cautioner pays the money he has a right under the principle of jus cedendarum actionum to enforce his claim against any person who is in a greater degree of liability than himself. He is not required to produce an actual written assignation of the claim, but only to instruct that he has made a payment under his obligation. Unless the matter were concluded by authority I should not be in favour of applying a strict criterion to a case of this kind, because it is quite obvious that payments of this kind are generally made in an informal way, and naturally it would not occur to mercantile people to insist upon a legal assignation before witnesses, according to the forms of the country where the vessel might happen to be. But in the present case I agree that this cannot be treated as an advance made upon security of the lien, and that it is in reality an advance made upon the credit of the owners, or those who represent the owners. I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair on both points. As to the first, the law as laid down by the Lord Ordinary appears to me to be perfectly accurate, and no authority or principle of law was cited to the contrary, although if any authority or legal doctrine had been discover-able Mr Horne would not have failed to bring it to our notice. He did July 16, 1908. say that there was one doctrine of law upon which he founded. It was ^{Clark v.} that according to our law contracts are to be construed according to the lex ^{Bowring & Co.} loci contractus. I am unable to admit that there is any general law to that ^{Lord Kinnear.} effect. It has been said over and over again in this Court, and in a comparatively recent case in the House of Lords, that the question whether the meaning and effect of a contract is to be determined according to the law of the place where it is made or of the place where it is to be performed is, according to the law of Scotland, a question of intention to be determined on the construction of the particular contract, and not by any absolute rule of law. In the present case I am not satisfied that the lex loci contractus ought to govern, even if the question depended solely on the construction of the contract. The true question is not what the contracting parties in New York intended, but whether the contract had the effect of creating a real security over a British ship, and consequently over the proceeds of the sale of that ship when it is sold in Scotland and the proceeds are put into the hands of the Court for distribution. I agree that that is a question for the lex fori to determine. We are to consider whether there is a good preference over the money in the hands of the Court where the sale takes place, and that must be determined according to our own law.

On the second point I agree with the doctrine by which it is held that when anyone in a foreign port is asked by the master of a ship to advance money for the payment of the wages of the crew, and agrees to do so, he is to be put into the shoes of the seamen whose wages he has paid so as to have the same rights and remedies against the ship as they would have had, because he is presumed to make advances upon the credit of the ship, which is the only fund of credit that, ex hypothesi, he knows anything about. He does not know the master nor the owners, and he makes the advances upon the credit of the ship. But it is consistent with that doctrine to hold that when a shipbroker is invited by the shipowners themselves to make advances, he may make what contract with them they choose to agree upon, and whatever his contract may be he must be supposed to rely upon their credit. If he desires to have a further security than their personal credit, it is open for him to stipulate for it; but if he does not—and in this case there is nothing to shew that the claimants did desire to make any stipulation—he is making a contract with the owners themselves to which the law does not attach as a consequence any right of lien over their property. I agree that the contract alleged is a contract by which the owners invited the claimants upon their credit to supply certain necessaries in order to enable their ship to proceed upon her voyage in England, and it appears to me that to say that they thereby acquired a right of lien over the ship is inconsistent with the agreement upon which they undertook to make the payment. On both points I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Subject of gift—Words importing gift of heritage—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 20.—Terms of a holograph testament containing the expressions "Everything else to be sold" and "I leave the remainder," which were held sufficient to import a bequest of heritage.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Johnston.

ON 24th December 1907 James Fitzgerald Crowe, Ashbrook Terrace, Dublin, assignee of Mrs Mary Jolly or Musgrave, Braconfell, Redhill, Surrey, brought an action against James Cook, Wrangholm Lodge, Portobello, concluding for declarator that the late Mrs Mary M'Neil Jolly or Hall Maxwell died intestate quoad her heritable estate, that Mrs Mary Jolly or Musgrave, as her heir-at-law, was entitled to succeed to that heritable estate, and that the pursuer, as assignee of Mrs Mary Jolly or Musgrave, was entitled to that heritable estate; and for decree ordaining the defender to convey to the pursuer the whole of that heritable estate.

The pursuer averred that Mrs Mary M'Neil Jolly or Hall Maxwell died on 24th March 1907 leaving certain testamentary writings. "The said testamentary writings deal solely with Mrs Hall Maxwell's moveable estate. With reference to her heritable estate, Mrs Hall Maxwell died intestate." He also averred that the defender had confirmed as executor-nominate of Mrs Hall Maxwell, and had taken possession of and made up titles in his own name to her whole heritable estate. He further averred that Mrs Mary Jolly or Musgrave was Mrs Hall Maxwell's heir-at-law, and as such entitled to succeed to her heritable estate, and that, by assignation dated 30th November 1907, Mrs Mary Jolly or Musgrave had assigned to the pursuer her whole right and interest in the estate, heritable and moveable, of Mrs Hall Maxwell.

The defender lodged defences in which he averred:—"The said testamentary writings also dispose of Mrs Hall Maxwell's heritage"; and pleaded;—The heritable estate of the testatrix being carried by her testamentary writings, the declarator sought should be refused.

"39 Melville St., Edinburgh.
"March 20th, 1903.

"I Mary M'Neil Hall Maxwell being in my proper mind, do hereby leave and Bequeath to James Cook the sum of ten thousand pounds Sterling—that is the said ten thousand that is at present lent to the Borough of Motherwell. I also wish him in case anything happens to me to see to my funeral and that all my animals are shot, and I appoint Mr Wedderburn of Carmet Wedderburn and Watson to assist him, all my Jewels—save a diamond Brooch Diamond pendant, which Mrs Jolly gave me, to be retured to her. eveythg else to be sold. I leave one hundred ponds to the Home for falln Sisters and one hundred to prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and Five hundred to my Mother, Mrs Margaret Jolly. Thre Hundred to my Aunt Miss Doro Fitzgerald who will also get all my Clothes that are of any use and I leave the remainder to fond and endow a small Home for old Colliers that have become unable to work, and the same to be furnished & a dinner given at Xmas and New Year, the same to have Beer and tobacco, and I July 17, 1908. appnt the before said Mr Wedderburn and James Cook to see that this is carried out. A site to be got on Newarthill grond but not on that owned by Messrs Nimo the preference to be given to those Colliers that may have worked in Stevenston and Newarthill Pits. And I sign this on the above date being of sond mind. (Signed) MARY M'NEILL HALL MAXWELL. Witnessed by Jemima Sutherland. (Signed) Jemima Sutherland, wittness."

Crowe v.
Cook.

Mrs Hall Maxwell, in addition to settled property, left moveable estate of the net value of £10,754, 13s. 9d., and heritable estate valued at £2066, 4s. 4d.

On 25th June 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) pronounced an interlocutor decerning against the defender conform to the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—In the application of the enactments of the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, to concrete circumstances, there are many cases, as was said by Lord M'Laren, as Lord Ordinary, in M'Leod's Trustees, 10 R. 1056, which come near the dividing line. It may be that this is one of them, though for my own part I think it not only does not cross, but is a good long way from reaching the Rubicon.

"Mrs Hall Maxwell left three documents of a testamentary nature. The first two, though informal, are exceedingly concise, businesslike, and clear in their intention. Mrs Hall Maxwell was in 1899 possessed of certain heritable property in Leith Walk, not, I gather, in itself of much intrinsic value, but possessing a potential or factitious value, because it was known that the Caledonian Railway Company wanted it for the purposes of their line. By a very brief document, dated 29th March 1899, by which time I think the railway company must have actually entered on possession, she bequeathed this property expressly to the defender, James Cook, and there is no doubt that by virtue of the 20th section of the Act of 1868 this document would have been a valid conveyance.

"But the sale to the railway company at £9000 was completed very shortly after, and on May 30th of the same year Mrs Hall Maxwell, on the narrative of the sale, bequeathed 'the said sum to James Cook.' Four years afterwards Mrs Hall Maxwell executed the third document, which is the cause of the present question. It does not expressly appoint executors. But it does so I think impliedly, and is an effectual, though informal, testament, and so good to transmit moveables. The question is, does it also carry heritage?

"It first bequeaths to James Cook £10,000, at present lent to the burgh of Motherwell. I think it was assumed that this included the £9000 derived from the Caledonian Railway Company, and that the prior bequest of this sum had been adeemed by its merger in Mrs Hall Maxwell's general estate, and its investment in this particular bond. The document then proceeds:—'I also wish him, in case anything happens to me, to see to my funeral, and that all my animals are shot, and I appoint Mr Wedderburn, of Carment, Wedderburn, & Watson, to assist him.' She then gives directions as to her jewels, leaves two small legacies to charities, two personal legacies, and a bequest of 'All my clothes that are of any use,' and then concludes 'I leave the remainder to found and endow a small house for old colliers that have become unable to work, and the same to be furnished and a dinner given at Christmas and New Year, the same to have beer and tobacco, and I appoint the before said Mr Wedderburn and James Cook to see that this is carried out, a site to be got on Newarthill,' &c.

"As I have said, I think that this must be read as, at least by implication, an appointment of executors, and, therefore, in the language of the above

Crowe v.
Cook.

Argued for the defender and reclaimer;—No technical words were now required to convey heritage in a mortis causa deed, provided that intention to do so was manifest from the deed.¹ In this case that intention was manifest. The words “everything else to be sold,” and “I leave the remainder,” clearly shewed an intention to dispose of the universitas of the estate, heritage as well as moveables, and the presumption was always against partial intestacy. Similar words had been held habile to carry heritage in a number of cases.² Further, the other construction of the deed, viz., that these words referred only to the jewellery, rendered the deed so absurd as to preclude the idea that that could have been the testatrix’s intention, for the value of the jewellery was only some £30, and quite inadequate to satisfy the legacies that followed. Indeed, it would be impossible to satisfy the mentioned section confers upon such executors ‘a right to claim and receive’ the granter’s moveable estate, in fact, to confirm and administer. But I think that there is superadded to the executry appointment something of the nature of a continuing trust.

“But that does not naturally result in the granter’s heritage being carried to the executors or trustees, even if they be regarded as having the wider title and functions. That result must be reached, if at all, by virtue of the provisions of the 20th section of the Titles Act, 1868. Now, in applying that section, if a testator has not only failed to convey his heritage, but even shewn himself so incapable of expressing his intention as to have failed to bring himself within the provisions of that section, I do not think that the Court is concerned with conjectures as to whether he did, notwithstanding, really intend to convey his heritage. As the late Lord President (Ingليس) said in Pitcairn’s case, 8 Macph., at p. 608, the statute did not intend ‘to make every will of a proprietor of land effectual as a conveyance of heritage.’

“I do not think it necessary to quote the section which has been so often canvassed. Shortly it provides that it shall no longer be necessary, in the mortis causa conveyance of land, to use words of de presenti conveyance or any voce signate, provided the document purports to convey or bequeath land, and by way of making this operative adds, that where such document ‘shall contain with reference to such lands any word or words which would if used in a will or testament with reference to moveables be sufficient to confer upon the executor of the granter, or upon the grantee or legatee of such moveables a right to claim and receive the same,’ such document shall be deemed and taken to be equivalent to a general disposition of such lands. The essential words are then ‘purports to convey or bequeath lands,’ and ‘with reference to such lands.’ Now, what the statute intended to cover was, I think, such a case as M’Leod’s Trustees, 2 R. 481. But though in my view it was contemplated that the ‘purporting’ and the ‘reference’ to land, either in general or special, was to be express, I recognise that by a series of decisions it has been accepted that the ‘purporting’ and the ‘reference’ may be implied. Still the question must always be, as put by Lord Young in Forsyth v. Turnbull, 15 R., at p. 176, shortly repeating what had already testamentary bequests unless the heritage were included in the estate July 17, 1908. disposed of by the will.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—The Lord Ordinary was right, for the presumption in law was that a testator intended his estate not otherwise disposed of to go to his heir or next of kin. Here the heritable estate was not otherwise disposed of. Section 20 of the Titles to Land Act only dispensed with formal words of conveyance where informal words “purporting to convey or bequeath lands” and “with reference to such lands” were used. Here there were no words purporting to convey or bequeath lands, and no reference to lands at all. The phrase “the remainder” had no antecedent words embracing heritage to which it could refer. The only antecedent words were “everything else,” and these words clearly referred to jewellery only,—to all her jewellery, with the exception of the diamond brooch. There was no appointment here of an executor or of trustees, and there was neither a disposition by habile words of the heritage, nor a bequest of the universitas of the estate. In these circumstances it was impossible to maintain that the heritage had been validly bequeathed.¹

been said by the Lord President Inglis in Pitcairn's case, supra, at p. 609, the question is not as to the sufficiency of the language to convey property, but as to the sufficiency to include land of the description of the property intended to be conveyed.

“In the present case there is certainly nothing which, in the document of 1903 under construction, expresses the intention to convey lands. But counsel for the defender sought to imply such intention from words which I have not yet quoted, viz., ‘everything else to be sold’, as raising the implication of a universal settlement. I abstained from quoting these words till now, because I think their meaning and relation has been entirely misunderstood. They occur in connection with the direction as to jewels, thus:—‘All my jewels—save a diamond brooch diamond pendant, which Mrs Jolly gave me, to be returned to her. everything else to be sold.’ This is ungrammatical and elliptical, but what it clearly means is, ‘my two special jewelled ornaments, which Mrs Jolly’ (her mother) ‘gave me are to be returned to her, and all my other jewels are to be sold.’ By no admissible construction can the words be twisted to imply the description of the lady’s universitas, heritable and moveable. But it was on this premiss only that it was contended that when the testator came to leave ‘the remainder’ to found her endowment, she meant the remainder of the realisations from her universal estate after paying her legacies. Neither can I accept the premiss, nor can I accept the conclusion without the premiss—indeed it was not pressed that I should do so—for this could only be on the suggestion that the testator was not likely to found such a charity, unless she contemplated devoting to it the whole residue of her estate, both heritable and moveable. It may be so, but the conclusion would require an excursion into the realms of conjecture, which I am not entitled to make.

July 17, 1908. At advising on 17th July 1908,—

Crowe v.
Cook

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the question is whether the will of the late Mrs Hall Maxwell does or does not carry heritage. I need not minutely examine the law generally on the subject, because the matter was so recently before us in the case of Jack's Executor v. Downie,¹ and I have nothing to add to what was then said. The only point is the application to this particular case. The case is, doubtless, a narrow one, and is narrow because of the very inartistic language in which the will is expressed, but on the whole I have come to a conclusion adverse to that of the Lord Ordinary. We have got the length, in Jack's Executor,¹ of holding that where an executor was told to realise "all my estate," and then the residue was disposed of, that indicated a clear intention to dispose of the testator's whole estate, and could receive effect. Now here, we have got almost the same thing. We have got "everything else to be sold," and "I leave the remainder to found and endow a small Home." I think the Lord Ordinary would have come to the same conclusion had he not considered that the "everything else to be sold" was limited, by the context in which the expression is found, to everything of a class which had been mentioned before, namely, jewels. I do not think that is the meaning. The will is the will of a very uneducated person. It is full of mistakes in spelling, and it complies with no rules of grammar. It shews evidently that the writer first put down things which came into her head, and then broke off as occasion offered. After making a special bequest, and then providing for her funeral, and for the disposal of certain animals of which she seems to have been fond, she appoints a certain gentleman to assist the person already named to whom she has left this legacy, and the care of the animals, and then she goes on thus,—“All my jewels—save a diamond brooch diamond pendant, which Mrs Jolly gave me, to be returned to her. everything else to be sold.” If you take that sentence as it stands, it is hopelessly ungrammatical. The words “all my jewels,” are never followed by any verb at all. Accordingly I think the natural meaning of what she wrote is this. She began by talking about her jewels. Then the mention of her jewels suddenly brought into her mind the existence of this particular brooch and diamond pendant, which she wished to be given to Mrs Jolly (who, I believe, was her mother), and, having provided for that, she then forgets that she has not supplied any verb to the jewels and goes on—“everything else to be sold.” I think what she means is “all my jewels and everything else to be sold,” and I think that is pretty apparent from what follows afterwards. She immediately goes on to leave a legacy of a hundred pounds to certain homes, and a hundred pounds “to prevention of cruelty to animals,” five hundred pounds to her mother, and three hundred pounds to her aunt, “who will also get all my clothes that are of any use.” There again is an instance of how this testatrix had her memory suddenly spurred by the phrase she used. I cannot accept the idea that she was leaving these legacies out of the proceeds of her jewels. We are told that the jewels were valued at the time of her death at about thirty pounds. Whether that valuation was small or large, it is perfectly evident that the testatrix never could have had the idea that she had jewels to such an amount as would meet these legacies. Then she July 17, 1908. goes on and leaves the remainder to found and endow a small home. The result of the whole matter is, that I have no moral doubt that the testatrix ^{Crowe v.} Cook.

 meant to deal with her whole estate. Of course I quite recognise that there ^{Ld. President.} must be words which carry out that intention, but I think that there are such words, if you take "everything else to be sold" in a general sense, and not merely as applicable to the jewels. I am prepared to take them in a general sense, because I think that is the meaning with which they were written in a badly constructed sentence. The result is, in my opinion, that the will carries heritage as well as moveables.

LORD M'LAREN.—I incline to think that in this case we are going further in the direction of giving a liberal construction to the 20th section than has been found necessary in previous cases. As to the word "estate" I have never had any difficulty. It is not ambiguous. It has been described as genus generalissimum, and it includes heritable estate not in virtue of a special meaning derived from the context, but because in its primary and proper meaning the word applies to immoveable as well as moveable subjects. The same may be said of the word "property"; in the absence of limiting words property means everything that belonged to the testator, with the possible exception of an unexercised power of appointment.

But the word "remainder" is ambiguous, or at least incomplete, because it means the result of subtraction, or what is left over out of property which the testator has announced an intention of dealing with. We must therefore look to the antecedent clauses of the will to discover whether this is a remainder of the heritable and moveable estates or of the moveable estate only. Now, I confess I have difficulty in finding in Mrs Hall Maxwell's will an antecedent to the word "remainder" from which I can infer an intention to deal with heritable estate. But I think I may say that such difference of view as exists does not touch any question of principle, because I think we are agreed that, in order to the 20th section taking effect on the heritable estate, we must find in the will evidence of an intention to dispose of a remainder which includes heritable estate. It has not been shewn that the money and household effects if sold would have sufficed to endow the home for old colliers which the testatrix meant to establish, and this is an element of evidence of intention to bring the heritable estate within the scope of the will. My doubt is whether in this particular will the word "remainder" is sufficiently proved, or defined, to be a remainder of the whole estate. But where so much depends on impression, I cannot say that my doubt is so strong as to induce me to dissent from the judgment proposed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair. I do not think that any difficulty arises in this case from the construction of the statute or from the general rules of law, because I take the law to be well settled as it is stated by Lord President Inglis in the case of Pitcairn.¹
 The statute requires, in order to give effect to what is called a "bequest of heritage," that such words of bequest shall be used with reference to lands

July 17, 1908. or heritable estate as would be sufficient to make a good bequest if they were used with reference to moveables; and, as the Lord President says, that is a provision which does not dispense in the least in regard to a bequest of land any more than of any other property with the necessity for specification of what is meant to be bequeathed. Therefore it appears to me that the only real difficulty that arises in this case is not in the construction of the statute but in the construction of the will. As to that, I may say that I am not surprised that there should be a difference of opinion. It is extremely difficult to make out what this lady meant. I do not think we are advanced very far by any attempt at grammatical analysis of language that was never intended to be grammar. We must take the words as they stand and try to get at what the testatrix really meant. If we read the words of her direction, "everything else to be sold," as covering everything except what has previously been otherwise bequeathed, then the conclusion that, when she goes on, after directing everything else to be sold, to provide for the application of "the remainder" in a certain way, she intends to dispose of her whole estate, follows of necessity. But then the sentence in which these words occur is so incoherent that it is impossible to be confident as to its meaning, and I am by no means certain that when she directs "everything else" to be sold, she does not mean merely that all her jewels are to be sold, except the diamond brooch. She begins to explain what is to be done with her jewels in general, and before she has explained it she turns off to make an exception, and having made that clear enough, she goes back again to her original notion about the other jewels and says what she wishes to be done with them. This is, I think, a possible construction, but supposing it to be correct, there still remains a distinct bequest "of the remainder," which she directs to be applied for a certain purpose. Now, it appears to me that the natural and ordinary meaning of these words is "the remainder of my estate." "I direct certain jewels to be sold. I direct certain provisions to be made for animals, and I leave certain sums of money and certain personal clothing, and all the remainder is to go to found and endow a Home for old colliers." I should say that means the remainder of her estate,—that is to say, all that is left after the previous bequests have been satisfied, and if that be a right construction of these words, then it is quite as effectual a method of describing her whole estate, heritable and moveable, as if she had inserted the word "whole" before the word "remainder," and the words "of my estate" after it. If she directed "the whole remainder of my estate" to be applied in founding a home for colliers, there could be no difficulty in the construction of these words, and no doubt as to the effect of the law introduced by the Act of 1868. On the whole, therefore, I come to the conclusion that this is a good bequest of the residue of this lady's estate, heritable and moveable, for the purpose of founding and endowing a Home for colliers.

 Mackenzie's Trustees v. Beveridge's Trustees.

Marriage-Contract—Election—Whether wife's conveyance of acquirenda to marriage-contract trustees carried her right to elect between legitim and a testamentary provision.—By her antenuptial contract of marriage a wife conveyed to the trustees therein named the whole estate then belonging to her, "or to which she may succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage." Her father having died during the subsistence of the marriage, leaving a settlement under which she was a beneficiary, questions arose between herself and her marriage-contract trustees as to the exercise of the right to elect between legitim and her testamentary provision.

Held that the right to elect remained with the wife, and had not been carried to the trustees by the conveyance of acquirenda in the marriage-contract.

On 6th March 1907 The Right Honourable John Campbell, Baron Overtoun of Overtoun, and another, being a majority and quorum of the trustees acting under the marriage-contract entered into between Robert Mackenzie and Mrs Elizabeth Hill Beveridge or Mackenzie, brought an action against David M'Lean and others, being the trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late William Beveridge senior (Mrs Mackenzie's father), and also against certain members of the family of the late William Beveridge as individuals. The summons concluded for declarator that the pursuers, as trustees and as assignees of Mrs Mackenzie under the marriage-contract, were entitled to payment of one-ninth of the late William Beveridge's personal estate, being Mrs Mackenzie's share of the legitim falling to her on her father's death. There were also conclusions directed against William Beveridge's trustees for accounting and payment.

The action was defended by William Beveridge's trustees, and also by individual members of William Beveridge's family, including Mrs Mackenzie.

The antenuptial contract of marriage, under which the pursuers held office, was signed on 30th May and 2d June 1873 by Robert Mackenzie and Miss Elizabeth Hill Beveridge. By the terms of that contract Robert Mackenzie conveyed to the trustees therein named policies of insurance on his life for £3000, and bound himself on his father's death to pay to them a further sum of £2000. He provided for his wife, in the event of her surviving him, an annuity of £300 per annum, and the whole of his household furniture and plenishing. He also discharged his legal rights in his wife's estate.

By the same contract Miss Elizabeth Hill Beveridge on her part assigned, conveyed, disposed, and made over to the trustees "All and sundry the whole means, estate, and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, now belonging to the said Elizabeth Hill Beveridge, or to which she has right, or to which she may succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage hereby contracted, with the whole rights, titles, and vouchers of the means, estate, and effects above conveyed by her, and the said Elizabeth Hill Beveridge binds and obliges herself to complete titles in her person to said means, estate, and effects, and to execute and deliver all such further deeds in July 17, 1908. Mackenzie's Trustees v. Beveridge's Trustees. favour of the said trustees as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this trust." The purposes for which this property was conveyed were declared to be—payment of the income to Mrs Mackenzie during her life, and to her husband for his life should he survive her; on her death, subject to the husband's liferent, the funds were to be held for, or paid over to, the children of the marriage, in such proportions and subject to such conditions as the spouses should direct; failing such direction then to the children equally. At the date of the marriage Mrs Mackenzie had no estate to convey to the trustees, and subsequently, prior to her father's death, only a legacy of £50 had come to the trust funds through her. Two sons were born of the marriage, Robert Duncanson Mackenzie and William Beveridge Mackenzie.

William Beveridge senior, Mrs Mackenzie's father, died on 23d January 1905, leaving moveable estate valued at approximately £130,000. He was survived by his widow, two sons, and his only daughter, Mrs Mackenzie. He left a trust-disposition and settlement by the seventh purpose of which he directed his trustees to make payment to his daughter (therein designed as Leila Beveridge or Mackenzie), of the sum of £2000, "but with and under the express provisions and declarations hereinafter mentioned." By the last purpose his trustees were directed, upon the death of his widow, to divide the residue of the trust-estate into five parts, and to pay two of such parts to each of his two sons and one part to his daughter, Mrs Mackenzie; his daughter's part, should she predecease the term of payment, to go to his grandson William Beveridge Mackenzie. The trust-disposition further provided as follows:—"Declaring always that my grandson Robert Duncanson Mackenzie, or his issue, shall not take any part in the succession to my means and estate, both he and they being hereby expressly excluded from any interest therein. Declaring always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that, both in respect of the said legacy of £2000 and to the share of the residue of my estate bequeathed as aforesaid to the said Leila Beveridge or Mackenzie, it shall be in the absolute power and discretion of the said trustees either to pay over to my said daughter the whole or any portion of the said legacy and share of residue bequeathed to her as aforesaid, and that at such time or times as may to them seem most expedient, or to postpone, so long as they may think it expedient to do so, the payment of the whole or any portion of the said legacy and share of residue bequeathed to her as aforesaid, or to retain the same during the said period of postponement vested in their persons as trustees aforesaid, or by deed under their hand to vest the same in the person or persons of other trustees or trustee, whom I hereby authorise them to appoint, so that the interest or annual produce of the said legacy and share of residue bequeathed to the said Leila Beveridge or Mackenzie as aforesaid may be paid to or applied for her behoof for her alimentary use during her life, or for such time as the said trustees may fix, and so that the capital shall be settled on, for behoof of, or be paid to the said William Beveridge Mackenzie under such restrictions and limitations, and at such times, and in such manner as the said trustees may in their own discretion deem most expedient, of which expediency and of the time and manner of exercising the powers and option hereby given they shall be the sole and absolute judges, and in the event of the decease of the said Leila Beveridge or Mackenzie before payment to her of the whole or any portion of said legacy and July 17, 1908. share of residue bequeathed to her as aforesaid, or before the exercise by the said trustees of the powers of distribution before specified, then ^{Mackenzie's Trustees v. Beveridge's Trustees.} I direct and appoint the said trustees to hold and apply the said legacy and share of residue, or so much thereof as may remain, to and for behoof of the said William Beveridge Mackenzie or his issue, in the event of his having died leaving issue, and that equally among such issue per stirpes."

The pursuers, besides setting forth the foregoing facts, also averred that William Beveridge's trustees refused to make payment of the testamentary provisions in favour of Mrs Mackenzie, but insisted on retaining these sums in their own hands with the object of defeating the purposes of the marriage-contract. That these purposes would be thereby defeated in respect, inter alia—(1) that Mr Mackenzie would lose his liferent interest on survivorship; (2) that the elder son of the marriage, Robert Duncanson Mackenzie, would be excluded from all interest in these sums; (3) that it would be in the discretion of William Beveridge's trustees to withhold from Mrs Mackenzie the whole or any part of these sums, or to subject them to such conditions as they might think proper to impose. They also averred that Mrs Mackenzie became entitled on her father's death to one-third of a third, or one-ninth part, of his free moveable estate as legitim, that she had declined to concur with the pursuers in claiming payment of her share of legitim, and that William Beveridge's trustees, though called upon, refused to make payment of that share of legitim to the pursuers.

In answer the defenders referred to a survivorship provision in William Beveridge's trust-disposition, whereby, on the death of either of his sons, that son's share should accrue to the surviving children, and averred:—"The defender Mrs Elizabeth Hill Beveridge or Mackenzie disputes the right of her marriage-contract trustees to claim legitim on her behalf. The amount of said claim for legitim will not exceed £13,000, whereas the provision made in her favour in Mr William Beveridge's trust-disposition and settlement amounts to, at least, £14,500; while, in the event of either of her brothers predeceasing her mother without issue, they will amount to, at least, £27,000, and may amount to over £43,000. The provisions in her favour are thus more valuable than her claim to legitim, and it would be greatly to her prejudice to elect to claim legitim. She maintains that the pursuers are not entitled to elect to claim legitim for her or to her prejudice."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said Mrs Elizabeth Hill Beveridge or Mackenzie having become entitled at her father's death to one-ninth part of his moveable estate in name of legitim, the pursuers, as her assignees under the said marriage-contract, are entitled to payment thereof. (2) The defender Mrs Mackenzie, being a party to the said marriage-contract, is barred thereby from disputing the pursuers' right to claim legitim, or from herself discharging legitim to the prejudice of her conveyance in the marriage-contract and of the trust purposes therein contained.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers, not being in right of the testamentary provision in favour of Mrs Mackenzie, and being unable to discharge the defenders William Beveridge's trustees thereof, are not entitled to elect between said provisions and legitim. (3) The pursuers not being entitled to claim

*Mackenzie's
Trustees v.
Beveridge's
Trustees.*

On 22d June 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) assolizied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.*

* "OPINION.—The object of this action is to have it declared that the pursuers, the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Mackenzie, are entitled, under the conveyance in the marriage-contract of the wife's acquiritenda, to payment of the legitim to which she is entitled from her father's estate. By the marriage-contract, dated in 1873, the husband made the provisions for his wife which are set out in cond. 1. The wife's father was not a party to the marriage-contract. On her part she conveyed, assigned, and disposed to the trustees her whole means, estate, and effects then belonging to her, or to which she had right, or to which she might succeed or acquire right, during the subsistence of the marriage, and bound and obliged herself to complete titles in her person to said means, estate, and effects, and to execute and deliver all such further deeds in favour of the trustees as might be necessary for carrying out the purposes of the trust.

"The trust purposes were (2) for payment of the income to her; (3) on her death for payment of the income to her husband should he survive her; (4) on her death, but subject to her husband's liferent, for the children of the marriage in such proportion as the spouses should direct, or failing appointment, equally. There were two children, Robert Duncanson Mackenzie and William Beveridge Mackenzie. The wife, at the date of the action, had contributed nothing but a legacy of £50 to the marriage trust.

"The wife's father died on 23d January 1905, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed his estate to the defenders in this case.

"By the seventh purpose of his settlement he left Mrs Mackenzie £2000, under the provision and declaration thereafter mentioned. A legacy of £2000 was left to the testator's grandson William Beveridge Mackenzie. One-fifth of the residue was left to Mrs Mackenzie. The testator's grandson Robert Duncanson Mackenzie was expressly excluded from any interest in his estate. The trustees were given absolute power and discretion, with regard both to the £2000 legacy and the share of residue left to Mrs Mackenzie, to pay or postpone payment, or to retain the same vested in their persons, or to vest the same in other trustees, so that the interest might be paid or applied for her alimentary use during her life, or for such time as the trustees might fix, and so that the capital should be settled on the testator's grandson, William Beveridge Mackenzie, as the trustees might deem expedient.

"The purposes of the marriage-contract and of Mr Beveridge's settlement were thus at variance as regards (1) the husband's contingent liferent; (2) any interest of R. D. Mackenzie; and (3) the discretionary power to the testamentary trustees over Mrs Mackenzie's capital.

"The marriage-contract trustees (with one exception) resolved to claim payment of Mrs Mackenzie's legitim to which she became entitled on her father's death. Mrs Mackenzie was called on by the pursuers to concur in this claim, but declined, and is a defender in the case.

"The figures given in ans. 7 were not disputed. The legitim will not exceed £13,000. The testamentary provision is at least £14,500. It was pointed out that, as payment of this is postponed till the widow's death, the legitim may prove to be as valuable. In the event of either of Mrs Mackenzie's brothers predeceasing her mother, without issue, the testamentary provisions will be, at least, £27,000, and may amount to over £43,000.

"It was argued on behalf of the pursuers that, on the death of Mrs

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First July 17, 1908. Division on 17th, 18th, and 19th March 1908.

Argued for the pursuers and reclaimers;—The clause under inter-pretation here was couched in well-known terms that had always been held to carry the universitas of the grantor's estate. The right to legitim vested ipso jure in the daughter on her parent's death; it was then an acquisitum of the daughter and formed part of her estate, and was therefore carried to the trustees in virtue of this universal assignation, and election was no longer competent to the daughter.¹ In any event, if the legitim itself was not carried, the right to elect to take it was carried to the trustees under this clause. The right of election with regard to legitim was in a different position from the right to elect between alternative provisions in a settlement by a third party, for the right to legitim existed as an expectancy during the lifetime of the parent and could not be defeated by him, although it

Trustees v.
Beveridge's
Trustees.

Mackenzie's father on 23d January 1905, a right to legitim vested in her; that she had, by her marriage-contract, conveyed her whole acquirenda to the trustees; that the right to legitim which had vested in her passed under this conveyance to them; and that she could do nothing to defeat the right they had so acquired. This argument was stated by counsel for the pursuers to be independent of any question of the amounts of the legal and conventional provisions respectively. It was maintained that, where the trusts upon which conventional provisions are to be held are inconsistent with the trusts of the marriage-contract, it is then not merely the right, but the duty, of the trustees under a marriage-contract, which contains a conveyance of acquirenda such as the present, to demand payment of legitim. According to this argument, a wife, by becoming a party to a marriage-contract such as the present, destroys her right to elect. It may be that the legitim would only give the wife £5000, and that a heritable estate worth £5000 a year has been settled on her by her father. The wife, however, could only take what would fall under the marriage-contract. She would not be entitled to elect at all, because by her conveyance of acquirenda she had already given the £5000 to her marriage-contract trustees.

"There is no doubt that legitim vests ipso jure by mere survivance. It was pointed out in M'Murray v. M'Murray's Trustees, 1852, 14 D. 1048, that this had been settled since 1843 by Fisher v. Dixon, 2 Bell's App. 63. Although, however, it is true that the right to legitim vests, it is equally true that another right completely vests, and that is the right to the testamentary provisions. This is emphasised by Lord Moncreiff and Lord Gillies in their opinion in Stevenson v. Hamilton, 1 D. 181, at p. 197, where they say—'That right (to the testamentary provision) is perfect and effectual to herself (the wife) unless the claim to legitim can be put forward in her right. A choice is to be made between these rights; and the material question is, who shall be entitled to make this election?' The question in Stevenson's case was, whether the creditors of the husband were entitled to maintain that all the personal rights of the wife became vested in him jure mariti, and that the right to the legitim having passed to him by the legal assignation of the marriage, he had an absolute right to claim it. The minority there held that the interest of the husband in the wife's legitim was one which she could not surrender, and the grounds upon which this was not until his death that the exact amount of it could be ascertained.¹ It was here the duty of the trustees to elect to take legitim, for that was in the interest of the beneficiaries of the trust, and the wife could not defeat that by exercising her election against the wishes of the trustees, who were onerous assignees, as thereby she would be derogating from her own grant.² The trustees' position was analogous to that of a trustee in bankruptcy, whose right to elect to take legitim had been a matter of decision.³ The case of Stevenson v. Hamilton,⁴ relied on by the respondents, did not rule this question. That decision, which dealt with a husband's jus mariti,⁵ really turned on the view, which then prevailed, that the husband's right was a right of administration only, and not a right of property; that he was really exercising a curatorial power for his wife, and must exercise it in her interest. Had there been a direct conveyance of the wife's property to the husband in Stevenson v. Hamilton,⁴ as there was to the trustees view was put support the pursuers' argument in the present case. The Court, however, negatived this view upon the ground that the husband's jus mariti, though it has many of the effects of a right of property, is in its proper nature a right of administration only. It was held that the right to elect was primarily in the wife, and that if the husband forced his wife to her injury to reject the testamentary provision which excluded the jus mariti, the Court would interfere.

"The interlocutor bears that, as the mutual claims of the husband and his creditors and of the wife did not admit of adjustment and division of the fund between them being made by the Court, the wife's claim was sustained. Stevenson's case was referred to in the Duchess of Buckingham v. Winterbottom, 16 D. 1129, and was followed in Lowson v. Young, 16 D. 1098. See also Macdougall v. Wilson, 20 D. 658. In the case of Aikman, 30 S. L. R. 804, it was held (by the Lord Ordinary, Lord Low) that an undischarged bankrupt was not entitled to reject his legitim, and take, instead, testamentary provisions, from which his creditors were purposely excluded. This was upon the ground that a right to legitim which vested in the bankrupt after the date of the sequestration, and while he was undischarged, was clearly 'estate' as defined in section 103 of the Bankruptcy Act, and that, therefore, the trustee was entitled to the vesting order asked. It was pointed out that the decisions of Stevenson and Lowson were not applicable to such a case.

"It was argued in the present case that as a claim to legitim cannot be given up to the prejudice of ordinary creditors, neither can it to the prejudice of marriage-contract trustees, who are in the position of creditors also.

"No doubt in regard to what the marriage-contract includes, it is onerous in the highest degree. The right of election, however, is personal and not transmissible, and until it is exercised by the only person who is entitled to do so, it cannot, in my opinion, be said that, within the meaning of the conveyance in the marriage-contract, the wife has succeeded to the legitim more than to her testamentary provisions. It appears to me that the right to elect remains, notwithstanding the terms of the conveyance. The wife may be barred from exercising that right, e.g., if she has granted a specific

Hamilton*¹ was clear from the comments on it in subsequent cases.² A right of election was not a purely personal right, it could be exercised by a curator,³ and legitim could not be discharged by a wife without her husband's consent.⁴ The case of *Reid v. Mackenzie's
Trustees v.
Beveridge's
Trustees.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—The father not being a party to this marriage-contract, the question turned solely on the transaction between the wife and her marriage-contract trustees. The right to legitim was really of the nature of a spes successionis,⁷ and a spes successionis was not a right of property, and was not carried by such an assignation as this, which assigned nothing but property.⁸ A spes would require a special assignation to carry it.⁹ Such a spes as a right to legitim did not become property until (1) the succession had opened, and (2) the child had elected to take the legitim, and these two events had not occurred here. It was wrong to say that the legitim provision vested in the child on the parent's death; it did so no more than did the testamentary provision;¹⁰ in fact what really vested was the right to choose between them. The obligation of the wife to the marriage-contract trustees was to hand over to them any property she acquired; she undertook no obligation to acquire property to her own prejudice for the benefit of the trust. The right of election was a personal right, and did not even pass to a curator.³ The assignation here could not be read as assigning to the trustees the right to compel the wife to exercise her personal right of election as they should dictate. The analogy from bankruptcy¹¹ was quite inapplicable, for the "estate" conveyed to the trustee in bankruptcy included "all rights, powers, and interests conveyance of her legal rights. Or, again, if she has become bankrupt, in like manner, she would forfeit her right to elect. I think, however, that unless there is something in the contract to bar her election, her right to elect remains. I am not able to hold that the terms of the marriage-contract under consideration are sufficient to operate as a bar.

"Nor do I think that there are circumstances in the case which necessitate the interference of the Court.

"I am accordingly of opinion that the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses."

Mackenzie's
Trustees v.
Beveridge's
Trustees.

At advising on 17th July 1908,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an action by marriage trustees concluding that they should be found entitled to the legitim which they say vested in the wife on her father's death, with further conclusions for accounting and payment.

Defences were put in by Mrs Mackenzie and her father's trustees setting forth that Mr Beveridge (Mrs Mackenzie's father) by his will had made certain provisions in favour of his daughter, which she considers more advantageous to her than the share of the father's estate which she might claim as legitim. The question then is whether Mrs Mackenzie has a personal right of election between legitim and the testamentary provisions in her favour, or whether the right of election lies with her marriage trustees in virtue of a general conveyance of her estate, acquired and to be acquired, contained in the contract of marriage.

The Lord Ordinary's opinion contains a full statement of the facts of the case, to which I refer, and I shall proceed at once to consider the case in its legal bearings. By the contract of marriage, executed in 1873, Mr Mackenzie assigned to the trustees two policies of insurance (£3000), and undertook to provide a further sum of £2000 for the purpose, inter alia, of securing an annuity of £300 to his wife.

Miss Beveridge conveyed to the same trustees "the whole means, estate, and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, now belonging to her, or to which she has right, or to which she may succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage hereby contracted," for the purposes of the marriage trust. These purposes include payment of the life interest or income of the estate to Mr Mackenzie in case of his survivance of his wife. Mr Mackenzie was called as a defender, but has not appeared to maintain his individual interests in his wife's estate, but I think it may be taken that the action of the marriage trustees sufficiently raises for consideration all the beneficiary interests that arise under the marriage-contract trust.

As regards Mr Beveridge's settlement (1902), we are only concerned with it in so far as it makes provision for his daughter and her family. Under the settlement Mrs Mackenzie is entitled to a legacy of £2000 and one-fifth share of the residue, and as to both provisions Mr Beveridge's trustees are empowered either to make immediate or postponed payment of the capital or to vest the money in trust for her life for alimentary use, and so that the capital may be settled on her son, William Beveridge Mackenzie. This son also receives £2000 in his own right. Nothing is given to the other son of Mr and Mrs Mackenzie.

Mr Beveridge's settlement makes no reference to his daughter's marriage—July 17, 1908. contract, and we do not know how far he was acquainted with its provisions. But under his own settlement his trustees are empowered to pay the capital of his daughter's provisions to herself, and if they choose to exercise the power, this capital sum, i.e., the £2000, and one-fifth share of residue would apparently fall as acquirenda to the marriage trustees, subject it may be to a question whether Mrs Mackenzie's son Robert would be entitled to participate. This follows from the decisions in *Simson's Trustees v. Brown*¹ and Douglas's Trustees v. Kay's Trustees.² Mr Beveridge's trustees do not say, and are probably not bound to say, how they propose to exercise the powers conferred on them, and I only refer to the power of paying the capital to Mrs Mackenzie because I think it may be inferred that Mr Beveridge's directions were meant for the benefit of his daughter, and were not conceived in any hostile spirit towards her husband, of which indeed the will bears no evidence.

Mackenzie's
Trustees v.
Beveridge's
Trustees.

Lord M'Laren.

In considering the legal question, I think we must approach it from the point of view that in general the right of election between legal and testamentary provisions is personal to the child.

With the exception of two cases in bankruptcy (to which I shall refer), the decisions are uniform to this effect. In the earliest case, Stevenson v. Hamilton,³ the decision was that of a majority, but in the later case of Lowson v. Young,⁴ where the point was raised under different circumstances, the decision was unanimous. This is a strong authority in favour of the wife's personal right of election, because the lady had at first proposed to claim legitim, but afterwards, and shortly before her husband's supervening bankruptcy, she changed her mind and accepted her father's testamentary provision (which excluded her husband's rights), and it was held that her election must be sustained.

In the argument for the pursuers much reliance was placed on the principle that the right of legitim vests by the death of the father; but this argument does not influence me, because it is equally true that the right to a testamentary provision vests. All that is meant is that no proceeding of the nature of adiation is necessary to fortify the right in either case. The truth is that each right vests conditionally on the other right not being claimed. The fact that there is an election proves that neither the legal nor the testamentary provision attracts the estate in a higher degree than the other.

The distinction was also taken that in the case of *Stevenson v. Hamilton*³ the competitors were the husband or his creditors, while in the present case the competing parties are the wife's disponees.

But I am not prepared to admit that under this contract of marriage the right of election between legal and testamentary provisions was conveyed to the trustees. The general rule is that a universal conveyance of estate does not carry an unexercised power, and this principle is very well illustrated by the decisions as to the effect of a general disposition in a testamentary deed. In such cases it has been inferred from the terms of the will, especially if the testator knew that he had the power, that the will was equivalent to an

³ 7 R. 295.

July 17, 1908. exercise of the power, But in the absence of indications of intention, the bare fact that the testator has a power of disposal is not sufficient to bring the subjects over which he has the power under the operation of his will.

Mackenzie's
Trustees v.
Beveridge's
Trustees.

Lord M'Laren.

Now, it may be that if Mrs Mackenzie had in plain terms conveyed her power of election to her marriage trustees, or, which is the same thing, had expressly authorised them to exercise her right of election, this action would be well founded. But I am unable to infer from the general conveyance of estate which she might acquire, that she intended to make over to marriage trustees the personal privilege of determining whether her legal or her testamentary provision was in all the circumstances the more advantageous in her own interest and that of her family.

It is pointed out by the Lord Ordinary that in certain events the legitim claim may be the more valuable, and that in other events the testamentary provision would be the more valuable of the two. This seems to be a fair case for personal election by the person who is to receive the benefit, and there is no question here as to unfairness in the exercise of the power.

If it is assumed, either absolutely or for the purposes of the argument that in this case the marriage trustees are in the position of assignees of the legitim, I do not think that their right is any stronger than that of the husband in the cases of *Hamilton*¹ and Lowson.²

The jus mariti is now only a shadow, but at the time when these questions were raised, it was a right very strongly founded in the law. It was considered to be founded on the "assignation of marriage," and that is exactly the nature of the assignation on which the case of the pursuers is founded. I can see no substantial distinction as regards the discretion or the onerosity of the right in the two cases, and I think that the decisions in question govern the present case.

The last point in the case is the argument founded on the two cases in bankruptcy—Aikman,³ and Wishart,⁴ where a trustee in bankruptcy was held entitled to claim legitim, against the wishes of the bankrupt, who naturally preferred that his rights should be left to the operation of his father's will. These are decisions in the Outer-House by Judges whose opinions are deserving of the greatest respect. In Wishart's case⁴ there is no considered opinion; the report only says, "held, following Aikman,"³ and states the decision.

Now, in effect these are decisions as to the extent and effect of the vesting clause of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. I do not doubt that under that clause a power may be adjudged by the trustee, because a power is in its nature adjudgeable, and the trustee without going through the form of an adjudication has all the rights of an adjudger. If we compare these cases with Lowson v. Young,² we see that in the one case the right of a bankrupt husband's trustee was not allowed to prevail against the right of the wife to choose the provision which protected her own money against her husband's creditors, while in the other case, where the question was between the husband and his creditors, no other person being interested, the right of the trustee was sustained. The cases are not inconsistent, because the questions were different, and as at present advised I should agree with Lords Kyllachy July 17, 1908. and Low in regard to the trustee's claim. In this connection Lord Kinnear has called my attention to the rule that a bankrupt is not entitled to renounce a succession where the renunciation will be productive of injury to his creditors without benefit to himself. But then I think the present case, if it is governed by authority at all, must be held to fall within the principle of *Lowson*¹ rather than that of Aikman,² because the principle is that where the interests of the wife, real or supposed, conflict with those of the husband or children, or trustees representing their interests, the election lies with the wife herself. It is only necessary to read the judicial opinions to see that the grounds of decision in Lowson's case¹ and the earlier case of *Hamilton*³ are absolutely different from anything that could be put forward in a question between a bankrupt and his trustee. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's decision.

Mackenzie's
Trustees v.
Beveridge's
Trustee.
Lord M'Laren.

LORD KINNAR.—I agree with Lord M'Laren. I am, however, disposed to rest my opinion rather upon the construction of this particular marriage-contract than upon general rules of law. Taking this view, I am not disturbed by the difficulties which were experienced by the learned Judges who decided the cases of *Hamilton v. Stevenson*⁴ and Lowson v. Young,¹ with reference to the operation of the jus mariti, and the consequent right of the husband or his creditors to interfere with the wife's election between legitim and testamentary provisions.

These cases seem to me to be different from the present in two very material respects. In the first place, the assignation of moveable property implied in marriage was universal, and, in the next place, over and above the right of property which was carried jure mariti to the husband, there was in him a right of administration which enabled him to control the wife's management of property belonging to herself; and accordingly the real point of difficulty in the cases of *Stevenson v. Hamilton*⁴ and *Lowson*¹ seems to have been whether the husband and his creditors could be allowed to interfere, to the disadvantage of the wife and for their own advantage, in the exercise of her right of election. The Court held that while they had an equitable power to control the right of election if it were used wrongly and to the disadvantage of persons having an interest in the subject-matter, in the cases in question there was no reason for interfering or allowing the husband to interfere with his wife's choice. It does not appear to me that a question of that kind arises at all in the present case, because on the construction of this marriage-contract I am of opinion that neither the legitim itself nor the right of choosing between legitim and testamentary provisions is conveyed to the trustees.

What is conveyed to the trustees is the whole means, estate, and effects belonging to the wife, or to which she had right at the date of the marriage-contract, or to which she might succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage. That assignation, of course, took effect immediately as regards the rights already acquired by the wife; but in order that it should take effect upon the other rights which she had not yet acquired, it

July 17, 1908. *was necessary in the first place that she should acquire them, and until she acquires right to it by succession or otherwise during the subsistence of the marriage, no estate falls within the terms of the conveyance. I do not think that she can be held to have acquired right to legitim before she has considered whether she will take legitim or something else which is offered by her father's testamentary settlement. It appears to me that, before that right can be included among acquisita as distinguished from acquirenda, it must be acquired by her determining that she shall take it. I cannot read the conveyance in the marriage-contract as equivalent to an assignation to the trustees of a right of election so as to commit to them the right of choice which belongs to the wife herself. I cannot go quite so far as I think the Lord Ordinary does, when he says that it is a right which is personal and not transmissible, because I am unable to see any sound reason in law why a child may not assign to trustees, if he or she thinks fit, the power to make a choice between two alternative rights. But I think it is necessary that she should do so in perfectly plain terms if it is to be maintained against her that she has conveyed her right from herself to anybody else; and there is nothing in this contract of marriage which to my mind can bear that meaning. What is conveyed is property. There is no special function committed to the trustees which could involve a right to exercise a discretion of this kind. Their duty is to ingather the estate when it becomes estate, and to administer it in a certain way, but to that their duty is confined.*

Mackenzie's
Trustees v.
Beveridge's

Lord Kinnear.

When the question arises whether the child shall take legitim or take the testamentary provisions, there may be conflicting interests which the trustees can have no power to determine. I do not say that there are in this case, but for the purpose of construing this contract we must keep in mind that the marriage trustees are not to determine between the spouses and the children whether the interest of the one is to be sacrificed to the interest of the other in making an election. It may very well be that the interests of the spouses conflict, and that the interests of the children conflict with both. There is nothing in this deed that I can see giving power to the trustees to determine any such conflict according to their discretion.

It was maintained to us in an ingenious argument that inasmuch as the right to legitim vests ipso jure on the death of the father, the assignation to the trustees took effect upon the legitim fund by the mere survivance of the daughter, and therefore that, when the father's will put it in her power to accept certain testamentary provisions provided she gave up her legitim, it was no longer within her option to make that bargain with the testamentary trustees, because she could not, as it was said, pay the price; the legitim fund had already gone to her own marriage-contract trustees; she could not account for it because it was theirs, and therefore she could make no choice between the two funds. I think that argument is open to the objection that it is an attempt to extend the verbal terms of a proposition in law to conclusions altogether beyond the intention of those who originally laid it down. I quite agree that we must accept the propositions laid down by so exact a lawyer as the first Lord Moncreiff,¹ from whose opinion this phrase was quoted in the course of the argument, and that we must follow them out to their necessary conclusions. But we must, in the first place, July 17, 1908. see exactly what Lord Moncreiff meant. When he says that the right to legitim vests ipso jure, that really means nothing more than this, that on the death of the father it passes to the child without the necessity for completing any formal title. That is the whole force and effect of the words ipso jure, and the same thing may be said of the right to a legacy under a will. The right to legitim passes by operation of law, the right to a bequest passes by operation of the will, but they both pass entirely and absolutely upon the child's survivance of the father; and the one, as Lord M'Laren has pointed out, is as conditional a right as the other, because the child cannot take legitim out of his father's estate except upon the condition of leaving the rest of the estate to go by the will, and he cannot take the testamentary provisions in lieu of legitim, except on condition of allowing the will to operate upon the legitim fund. Therefore there is, to my mind, a perfectly clear right of election which must be exercised before the child can take either the one provision or the other.

Mackenzie's
Trustees v.
Beveridge's
Trustees.
Lord Kinnear.

I quite agree also with Lord M'Laren with reference to the case of Aikman.¹ I should be very sorry to say anything inconsistent with Lord Low's judgment in that case, which appears to be perfectly sound. But then I think it rests upon a ground in law which stands quite clear of that upon which the present case ought to be decided, namely this, that the right to legitim having vested in the bankrupt he could not be allowed to surrender it, to the prejudice of his creditors. It was really an equitable power to control the exercise of a right which a man sui juris would certainly have been entitled to exercise, but which the bankrupt, whose whole property belongs to other people, cannot be allowed to exercise to their prejudice. The bankrupt's father had left him a provision in his will on condition that if he were not discharged—he had already been sequestered before the will was made—it should not be paid to him but held for the benefit of his children, and he very naturally maintained that he should prefer this money to go to his children rather than let the legitim go to his creditors. The whole question was whether he could be allowed to sacrifice his creditors' interests in that way, and Lord Low held that he could not. I agree with him, but I do not think that throws any light upon the construction of this contract of marriage.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I confess I have myself found this case attended with great difficulty, but I had the opportunity of perusing the opinion which has just been delivered by my brother Lord M'Laren, and I am prepared to concur in that opinion. I do so the more easily because your Lordships both take the same view as the Lord Ordinary.

I think the case in the end comes to depend on a very small though not simple proposition, and that is, does or does not a conveyance of acquiritenda in a marriage-contract convey the right of election? I have come to the conclusion that it does not. There is one consideration which to a certain extent affects my mind. It is this: I see great difficulties in working out the idea that the trustees in a marriage-contract should have the right of July 17, 1908. election, because what is to be their criterion in exercising it? To whom is their duty? The duty of trustees is of course to the whole of the beneficiaries under the settlement, and yet the question, whether it is better to take legitim or to take the testamentary benefit that is offered instead may raise perfectly cross interests, if I may use the phrase, among the beneficiaries to whom the trustees have got an equal duty. That class of difficulty never arises in a bankruptcy case, because the trustee in a bankruptcy case has one duty and one duty alone, which is to take whatever will bring in ready money for the creditors. He would never have any doubt whatsoever as to what he had better do in taking either legitim or testamentary provisions. With other trustees it is quite different, and therefore it is only the natural result to hold here that a conveyance of acquiritenda does not convey the right of election, but only binds the lady to hand over to her marriage trustees whatever she gets after she has got it.

Carter v. Lang
& Sons.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), Sched. I., secs. 1 (b) and 2 (a) and (c)—Amount of Compensation—“Average Weekly Earnings”—Mode of Computation.—In ascertaining the amount of the average weekly earnings of a workman entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the leading canon is, as stated in sec. 2 (a) of the First Schedule, that “average weekly earnings shall be computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated.”

In an ordinary case the average weekly earnings of a workman are to be ascertained by dividing the total amount earned during the relevant period of his employment by the number of weeks actually worked within that period, and, if there are regularly recurring trade holidays when no work can be done, by deducting from the result thus obtained a fraction equal to the fraction of the year during which for this reason no wages can be earned.

In ascertaining the average weekly earnings the question whether those days in any week on which the workman was absent from work are to be disregarded depends on the nature of the employment, and in an employment where it is customary to work for only a limited number of days in the week, the amount earned in these days may be taken as the weekly earnings of the workman.

In the application of sec. 2 (c) of the First Schedule, “absence from work due to illness or any other unavoidable cause” means absence from work due to a cause personal to the workman, as distinguished from causes due to the work, such as trade holidays or an accidental stoppage of machinery.

The question whether, in view of the shortness of the employment or of the other considerations indicated in sec. 2 (a) of the First Schedule, it is practicable to compute the rate of remuneration at the date of the accident from the facts of the workman's own employment, is a question of fact for the determination of the arbitrator, and is to be settled in each case by a consideration of the whole circumstances of the employment.

A workman who had been incapacitated by accident, and who was July 17, 1908. entitled to compensation, had been at the date of the accident for thirteen weeks in his employment. During that period he had earned for one week nothing, and for another week very little, on account of illness, and again for one week had earned nothing, and for another week very little, on account of trade holidays. The arbitrator calculated his average weekly earnings by dividing his total earnings by thirteen. Carter v. Lang & Sons.

In an appeal by stated case, the Court, after enunciating the general rules above stated, recalled the determination of the arbitrator, and remitted to him to proceed.

Bailey v. G. H. Kenworthy, Limited, [1908] 1 K. B. 441, commented on.

In an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Paisley, at the instance of John Carter, labourer, against John Lang & Sons, engineers, the Sheriff-substitute (Lyll) awarded certain compensation, and at the request of the claimant stated a case. 1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

The case stated :—"This is an arbitration in which the following facts were admitted :—

"On 8th August 1907 the appellant, who was a workman in the employment of the respondents, sustained personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, whereby he was and is incapacitated. He had been in the said employment and in the same grade, and the relationship of master and servant had existed between the parties, from Wednesday, 8th May 1907, till Thursday, 8th August, the day of the accident. The trade week in the works of the respondents runs from Wednesday to the following Tuesday, and the period of his employment had thus embraced thirteen weeks and two days, inclusive of the day of the accident. During that time there had been certain short periods in which the pursuer had earned no wages owing to his absence on account of (1) illness, and (2) Johnstone general holidays. As thus—for the week ending 11th June 1907, the appellant had earned nothing on account of being off work through illness; for the week ending 2d July he had earned only 15s. 11d., being off work for part of the time through the same cause; for the week ending 16th July he had earned nothing, and for the following week, ending 23d July, he had earned only 3s. 8d., on account of the occurrence of Johnstone general holidays.

"I held that the period of the pursuer's employment with the defenders was from 8th May to 8th August 1907, that the said period of employment was continuous and uninterrupted by the necessary absences above detailed, that the said period consisted of thirteen weeks and two days, and that it was practicable, at the date of the accident to the appellant to compute his rate of remuneration. I found further that the proper method of computing the appellant's average weekly earnings during that period, in the manner best calculated to give the rate per week at which he was being remunerated, was to discard the amount earned during the two days of the week when the accident occurred, and to divide the total of the rest of the earnings by the number of weeks in the period of employment, viz., thirteen, and that the compensation to be awarded should be 50 per cent of the sum so arrived at."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were :—" (1) Whether the said period of employment was so short as to make it impracticable at the date of the accident to compute the rate of the appellant's remuneration? (2) Whether the said period of employ-

July 17, 1908. ment should have been regarded as continuous and uninterrupted by the said short periods of absence due to illness and the occurrence of Johnstone general holidays ? or (3) Whether the times of absence from the said unavoidable causes should have been, in the first place, discounted in reckoning the said period of employment, before the arbiter proceeded to compute the average weekly earnings of the appellant ?"*

Carter v. Lang & Sons.

Argued for the appellant ;—The leading rule for the calculation of average weekly earnings was that they were to be computed in the manner best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated.¹ The method adopted by the arbitrator was in direct violation of this rule, for it gave, not the normal weekly rate, but the rate at which a workman was remunerated who was always out of work for four out of every thirteen weeks. This method had been disapproved in the English Courts.² It perpetuated the anomalies³ which the Act of 1906 had been expressly designed to remove. The proper method was to ignore those weeks in which the workman had been absent either through illness or on account of holidays, and to divide his total earnings by the number of weeks during which he was at work. Weeks when he had only worked for a few days should be reckoned as part of a week and not as a whole week. The words "uninterrupted by absence from work" in section 2 (c) of the First Schedule meant that such absences were to be excluded from the calculation, not included, which would be the effect of the respondents' contention. The Court should answer the third question in the affirmative, and find it unnecessary to answer the second question. The appellant was willing that the first question should be answered in the negative.

Argued for the respondents ;—The phrase "average weekly earnings" first appeared in the clause dealing with the case where the injury resulted in death.⁴ In such a case the first event which was provided for was where the man had worked for three years in the same employment. In such an event there was no doubt that his actual earnings were the measure of compensation, and that no allowance was made for his having been absent from illness or from any other cause. This was the leading principle, and it was not to be presumed that a different method was to be adopted where the injury resulted in incapacity, or where the man had been employed for a shorter period than three years. There was no authority for dropping out of the calculation any time when the man was not at work for any reason. Section 2 (c) was no authority to this effect, for that section was only intended to provide that employment was to be considered continuous although in fact broken by absence through illness.⁵ Having provided that, its purpose was spent, and it could not be further invoked to support the proposition that no account was to be taken of idle weeks.

At advising,—

one, not because of the amount involved, but because we are, I think, bound July 17, 1908 to give what guidance we can as to the way of arriving at an average wage under the recent Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. Carter v. Lang & Sons.

The facts upon which the case arises are these: The appellant was taken Ld. President. into the service of the respondents on Wednesday, 8th May 1907, and he worked till Thursday, 8th August 1907, upon which day the accident happened. The history of his employment, so far as his wages were concerned, is this: The period within the dates which I have specified extends to thirteen weeks and two days. Discarding the two days, he worked nine out of these weeks at what may be called full wages. For the week ending 11th June he earned nothing, on account of being off work through illness; for the week ending 2d July he earned only 15s. 11d., from the same cause, being partially off through illness; for the week ending 16th July he earned nothing, and for the week ending 23d July he earned only 3s. 8d., the reason for that shortage being that there intervened the period of the Johnstone general holidays. What the learned Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator did is set forth in the case. He said:—"I found that the proper method of computing the appellant's average weekly earnings during that period, in the manner best calculated to give the rate per week at which he was being remunerated, was to discard the amount earned during the two days of the week when the accident occurred, and to divide the total of the rest of the earnings by the number of weeks in the period of employment, viz., thirteen, and that the compensation to be awarded should be 50 per cent of the sum so arrived at." The question is whether he was right in that determination. The questions of law that the learned Sheriff has put to your Lordships are, first,
"Whether the said period of employment was so short as to make it impracticable at the date of the accident to compute the rate of the appellant's remuneration"; and second, whether his method of computation was right.

We were referred to the only case that has been decided upon this part of the recent Act—namely, four cases decided together of Perry, Cain, Bailey, and Gough,¹ decided by the Court of Appeal in England. I have exceedingly carefully considered what was said by the learned Judges in that case. We are, of course, not bound to follow them. On the other hand, their opinions are entitled to the greatest respect, and there will doubtless be sooner or later an occasion when both these opinions and any opinions which your Lordships may deliver to-day will be subjected to the review of the House of Lords. Therefore, I am very anxious that we should, if possible, lay down once for all what we consider to be general rules under the statute.

Your Lordships are well aware that this question really arises upon a new section which makes its appearance in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and which was not in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. But the sections which are before and after are precisely the same in the two Acts. The point arises under the Schedule, and the Schedule runs in both cases thus²:—"Scale and conditions of compensation. The amount of compensation under this Act shall be (a) where death results from the injury
(i) if the workman leaves any dependants wholly dependent upon his earn-

July 17, 1908. there had been several times that he did not actually work—once by reason of a canal having burst its bank and stopped the whole works; once by reason of accidents in the works to boilers and machinery; and twice by holidays—one being what is called “Wakes Week,” when all the mills at Ashton were closed—which corresponds with the Johnstone trades holidays in this case—and one being the usual Bank Holidays, when the works were not open. The problem was to reduce piecework payments to an average weekly wage. What the County Court Judge did was simply to take this £83, 2s. 1d. and divide it by 52. The Court of Appeal held that was wrong; but I do not think the three Judges came to quite the same conclusion as to what was right. So far as I am concerned, I agree with the method of Lord Justice Moulton. Lord Justice Moulton points out that there is a distinction between absences which are due to something personal to the workman—such as illness, or to accidental stoppages of the works—and absences owing to regular holidays in the course of the employment. Accordingly the calculation which he made in that case, and I think it was a correct calculation, was this: He assumed that the man had been absent for three weeks in the year. One of these weeks he took as due to temporary stoppages owing to accidents to boilers and machinery, and a fortnight as due to the fact that there were regular holidays, during which the works were not open. Well, he says there are forty-nine weeks that the man has actually spent in labour in order to earn £83, 2s. 1d., which he was paid by piecework; and therefore he began by dividing the £83, 2s. 1d. by 49. But then he says if I take that to be the average weekly wage of the man, I should really be putting him in a position of earning more in the year than any man de facto could earn, because any man in this particular trade could only have fifty weeks’ work in the year, there being two weeks’ holidays, and he says the employer must not be compelled to pay more to an injured workman than a sound workman could have earned. Inasmuch as two weeks is a twenty-sixth of the whole year, he reduces the dividend which he first got by dividing £83, 2s. 1d. by 49 by a twenty-sixth, which is a perfectly right method of proceeding. But in the course of his opinion he uses the expression that if a man in receipt of £2 per week does not choose to go to work for a particular week, that does not alter the fact that the weekly rate at which he is being remunerated is £2;¹ and that is what has crept into the rubric. If by that he only means that when you are thinking of a week’s average wage, and considering the week as a unit, you are not necessarily to take into the computation another week in which the man gives himself a holiday, I agree with him; but if it be said that in every case, as is put in the rubric, days in which no work is done are to be disregarded, I do not agree. It depends upon the nature of the employment. For instance, in the colliery trade, we are well aware that colliers, who are paid by each day that they go down into the pit, as a matter of fact rarely work six days a week, and sometimes when wages are exceedingly high they work very few days in the week. Supposing you had a collier whose general method was to work two or three days a week, and who was paid so much a day, it would be out of the question to compute that man's average July 17, 1908. weekly wage as being six times the amount he earned each day as if he had worked for six days. As the first clause of the section is the dominating clause telling us that the average weekly earnings are to be computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week, the real practical experience of that collier's life is that for him a week's wage is the wage he earns for working on three or four days a week. Therefore I think it necessary to be very precise about this, because otherwise I am afraid that that rubric would be misunderstood.

Carter v. Lang
& Sons.

Ld. President.

Now, I come to the difficult part of the question in regard to this subsection (c) which says that employment by the same employer shall be taken to mean employment by the same employer in the grade in which the workman was employed at the time of the accident, uninterrupted by absence from work due to illness "or any other unavoidable cause." The English Court of Appeal have considered that directly in the case of *Bailey*¹ with reference to a case of illness. Lord Justice Moulton² held that these temporary absences, due to holidays and accidents to machinery, were neither here nor there as far as this subsection was concerned, because he held that "other unavoidable causes" must be ejusdem generis with illness. What I think he means by ejusdem generis with illness must be ejusdem generis not in the strictest sense of the word, such as a broken bone, which is not an illness but something like it. Unavoidable causes referred to in section 2 (c) must be causes personal to the workman,—that is to say, anything which has to do, not with the workman, but with the work, such as those stoppages referred to in the case of Bailey,¹ was not touched by this clause. I agree with another observation that was made in that case, namely, that you cannot argue as to the true meaning of what you are to do in a shorter period from what you find done in a longer period of three years.³ That disposes of a somewhat ingenious but rather too fine argument of the learned Dean in this case.

I think the view of the Legislature in subsection (c) was simple enough, and it applies not only to the three year period but also to the one year period. Where you have got a workman with one year's experience, then you have got a long enough period, and you may take it that the length of the period will give a fair average for the person concerned. The difficulty comes in where you have not got a long period, but where you have to find out the weekly average for the whole of the man's working life by a short period of work. It is in regard to that that this subsection comes in. The meaning of it seems to me to be this: If you have not got twelve months' experience, which will give you a law for that particular man, and if you find that the period is so short during which he has been working that you have to go to somebody else, not him, for an illustration, then you must take somebody else's history as that history is uninterrupted by illness or absence from any other unavoidable cause. In other words you are not to assume that because A has been ill for so many weeks, and consequently has reduced the practical amount of his earnings—you are not to assume that B, if he had been

³ [1908] 1 K. B., at p. 460.

July 17, 1908. working, would have been ill in the same way. No doubt that has the effect of doing away with what I call the hardship in such a case as Grewar.¹ Being such a rough provision, it no doubt cuts the other way also. Where you have a really long period practically you get such illnesses as a man in his life is subjected to, but where you calculate upon a short period, as evinced by somebody else, you really practically assume that the man would never be ill at all. I cannot help that, that is the way the statute has put it, and after all these things are done in a statute with a very rough axe.

Carter v. Lang
& Sons.

Id. President.

That is all I have to say except one thing about the question of the shortness of time making it impracticable for the Sheriff to calculate an average. There are very good instances in the three English cases other than the case of Bailey,² where the question was raised of whether it was impracticable from shortness of time. Although we are asked here to answer the question as one of law, I think the question as to whether the time was so short as to make it impracticable to calculate an average is a question of fact. Accordingly if the Sheriff, acting as arbiter, had come to the conclusion that the time which this particular workman worked was either so short as to make it impracticable, or was long enough to make it practicable, I should be very slow to disturb his judgment. I cannot help disturbing the Sheriff's judgment here, because he has, for the reasons I have already stated, gone altogether wrong upon the principle, and accordingly his judgment such as it is about the shortness of time was a judgment, based upon the assumption that he had thirteen weeks to go on, whereas as a matter of fact he only had nine. But as little am I inclined to lay down as a fact in this case that it was impracticable to reckon an average on account of the shortness of time, because I think that also depends upon considerations which are not before me, but which could be before the Sheriff. Supposing there is a trade in which there is an absolutely steady wage, as, for example, the case of an ordinary man employed in a shop at so many shillings weekly during the whole year, and supposing that the man had only been in the particular service two or three weeks, yet inasmuch as it was an engagement by the week, which would have lasted on to the end of the year, I think these two or three weeks, or even one week, would be quite sufficient to shew what was the average weekly wage. But on the other hand, where you have classes of employment which vary very much in different times, in which the wages per week would be very different at one period of the year from those of another, and in which employment is very much more abundant at one period of the year than at another, then a very much larger number of weeks might be required in order to calculate a proper average. Lord Justice Moulton also notices this, and gives the illustrations of a ferryman and a charwoman.³

Therefore I do not think that the question of the shortness of time making it impracticable to reckon an average can be settled by a mere question of figures. It must be settled in each case by a consideration of the whole circumstances of the employment. I think that is a matter which the Sheriff has got to look into and determine. Therefore, I am not for answering the question of the Sheriff, but am for telling him that, with such help as he may get from the views we are now laying down, he must July 17, 1908. determine that matter for himself. If he holds that the experience he has got of this man's nine weeks' work is sufficient, that the work is always very much the same in this employment, and that nine weeks at this time of the year will enable him to have the proper factors for arriving at an average, then I think he must proceed with his sum as Lord Justice Moulton did, that is to say, he must divide what the man earned by the number of weeks in which he earned it, and then go on to consider whether the man would have worked fifty-two full weeks in the year. If there were holidays he must make a deduction. Assuming that he has holidays extending over two weeks, he must deduct a twenty-sixth from the average sum obtained by dividing the total amount earned by the number of weeks during which the man was working. Without answering the question as put, we should, I think, remit the case to the Sheriff to inquire for himself whether he considers, in the whole circumstances, that the period was or was not too short to allow him to judge from the man's own wages what a proper average wage would be. If he thinks it is long enough he could then proceed arithmetically to determine the average. If he thinks it is not long enough he must take somebody in the same work and in the same grade, if he can find him. If there is no such person, then he must take somebody in the same grade in some other work in the neighbourhood, keeping steadily in view the first sentence of subsection 2 (a), to find what that man in the course of the year would earn fairly one week with another, and not pinning his attention particularly to the week or the few weeks preceding the time at which the accident actually happened.

Carter v. Lang
& Sons.

Ld. President.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair, and only add a few words on the construction of section 2 (a) of the First Schedule. That portion noted as (a) consists of two provisions, the first being a direction as to how the average weekly earnings are to be ascertained, and the second being a proviso to the effect that where it is impracticable to obtain a sound average in the ordinary way, the arbitrator may draw his conclusion by considering what would be the average wage earned by a person in the same class and grade of employment. Under the statute of 1897 we had no difficulty in knowing what to do, because the statute gave right to a sum described as average weekly earnings. The week was the unit, and whether the number of weeks was great or small, the arbitrator, and the Court in reviewing his judgment, had only to perform the operation of ascertaining the arithmetical mean by adding together the wages received in various weeks and dividing them by the number of weeks. In cases like Grewar,¹ where the method was applied to short periods—in that case consisting of two broken weeks—the mean of two broken weeks would certainly not give a proper approximation to the wage that a healthy man might earn in the course of the year. But then no other mode of estimating the wage was open to the arbitrator or to the Court, and after all it was for the benefit of the workman that he should be awarded a sum based on this computation, small as it was, because in no other way could he get anything. It seems to have been brought to the notice of the Legislature that there

July 17, 1908. were cases where, owing to the shortness of the period, or the irregularity of the work, it was impossible to get fair results in this way. No doubt, if there are only two weeks, you may perform the operation of obtaining the amount by adding the two sums of wages together and dividing. But that is a mere arithmetical operation, and it does not follow that it would give a true estimate of the average earnings of the workman over a year. The principle of obtaining the mean result is to suppose there is some rule or permanent element underlying the varying elements of the computation. The object of taking the average is to eliminate all irregularities or incidental circumstances, and, of course, the greater the number of factors that are to be averaged, the greater is the probability of arriving at a true result. This is really elementary, and I only mention it because I think it explains the motive of the Legislature in this provision of rule 2 (a). I judge from the terms of the statute that we are not intended to lay down any definite criterion as to the number of weeks which would in all cases be sufficient to enable the arbitrator to arrive at a true average. The proviso has reference to particular cases, and it may be that while in this case, owing to the interruptions and other causes, we do not see that a fair average can be got out of nine weeks' employment, there may be many cases where three or four weeks would be quite sufficient to enable the arbitrator to get an average, as for example, in a case in which a man works steadily, and for the full number of working hours during the whole time. With regard to the mode of proceeding where there are irregularities in the period of service, I think we are safe in availing ourselves of the aid of so distinguished a mathematician and scientist as Lord Justice Moulton, and I quite agree that the mode of calculation which he proposes is sound, and applicable to the circumstances of the present case. I agree with your Lordship that the proper course is to remit the case to the Sheriff, as arbitrator, to proceed in terms of the rules we have referred to.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord President.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find it unnecessary to answer the questions of law as put in the case: Recall the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator, and remit to him to proceed."

Fenton
Livingstone v.
Crichton's
Trustees.

Right in Security—Heritable Security—Personal obligation—Transmission to heir—"Personal right"—"Taking estate by succession"—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sections 9 and 47.—Section 9 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, enacts, that a personal right to every estate in land shall vest in the heir by survivance. Section 47 enacts, that a heritable security for money constituted over an estate in land, together with any personal obligation to pay the debt, shall transmit against any person "taking such estate by succession," and that the personal obligation may be enforced against such person by summary diligence. July 18, 1908.

Held that a person in whom a personal right to an estate in land has been vested by survivorship, but who has not made up a title thereto, or entered into possession, has not "taken" such estate by succession within the meaning of section 47 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and is not liable to personal diligence for the debts of his predecessor secured by bond over the lands. Fenton Livingstone v. Crichton's Trustees.

ON 18th May 1908 Thomas Frederick Fenton Livingstone, mid-shipman, H.M.S. "Bedford," a minor, and John Johnstone M'Murdo, solicitor, Airdrie, as his curator bonis, were charged at the instance of William Gibson and others, trustees of the deceased Hew Hamilton Crichton, W.S., and of the deceased Miss Margaret Crichton, to make payment of two sums of £1200 each contained in a bond and disposition in security over the lands of Easter Moffat, near Airdrie, granted by the deceased George Frederick James Fenton Livingstone. The bond was in ordinary form, and contained a personal obligation for payment of the amount due. The charge proceeded upon a warrant obtained in virtue of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874. 1st Division.
Bill-Chamber.

The complainers averred:—(Stat. 1) "Thomas Frederick Fenton Livingstone is the eldest son of the late George Frederick James Fenton Livingstone of Easter Moffat, near Airdrie, who died on the 16th day of August 1907, survived by his widow and three children.

" (Stat. 2) "George F. J. Fenton Livingstone was the proprietor of the fee of the estate of Easter Moffat. The estate was, and is still, held in liferent by his mother, Mrs Christian Margaret Waddell or Fenton Livingstone, widow of the late Thomas Fenton Livingstone. At the date of the death of George Fenton Livingstone there were three bonds over the said property—(1) a first bond for £13,000 held by certain trustees; (2) a bond for £5000 in favour of Mr Livingstone Clarke; and (3) a bond of £3400 paid off to the extent of £1000, which was assigned to the extent of £2400 to the late Hew Hamilton Crichton, W.S., and his sister, Margaret Crichton, and the survivor of them, and is now held by the respondents, who are trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of each of those parties. These bonds rank in the order above mentioned. Further, the estate is burdened with a secured annuity of £400 a year payable to the widow of George Livingstone, which comes into force on the death of the present liferentrix." (Stat. 3) "The late George F. J. Fenton Livingstone died intestate, and the complainer, Thomas F. Fenton Livingstone, has not made up any title to the estate of Easter Moffat.

" (Stat. 4) "The respondents, acting as trustees respectively of the late Hew Hamilton Crichton and the late Miss Margaret Crichton, have called upon the complainers to pay off the said bond which is held by them over the said estate of Easter Moffat. The complainers, in view of the fact that the said heir-at-law has not made up a title to said estate, have not paid said bond, and the respondents have charged the complainers by four separate charges, dated 18th May 1908, to make payment to them, as trustees foresaid, of the two several sums of £1200, with interest at 4 per centum per annum from the term of Martinmas 1907 until payment." (Stat. 6) "The estate of Easter Moffat is at present being enjoyed by Mrs Christian Margaret Waddell or Fenton Livingstone in virtue of the July 18, 1908. Fenton Livingstone v. Crichton's Trustees. liferent right which she holds therein. . . . It is believed and averred that if the fee of the estate were put on the market at present, subject to the said liferent and annuity at present heritably secured thereon, it would not realise the sum of £18,000, being the amount of the prior bonds thereon. Even if Thomas F. F. Livingstone made up a title to the said estate he would not be lucratus thereby."

The complainers' statements were not in substance disputed.

The respondents stated :—"The said bond was duly called up, as at Whitsunday 1908, by intimation, dated 29th November 1907, addressed to and accepted by the firm of the complainer John Johnstone M'Murdo, as agents for the other complainer. They subsequently carried on negotiations on behalf of the said Thomas Frederick Fenton Livingstone for the continuation or partial repayment of said bond. The presentation of the present note is the first occasion on which the complainers have maintained that the complainer Thomas F. F. Livingstone is not the debtor in the bond held by the respondents."

The complainers pleaded ;—(3) The complainer Thomas F. Fenton Livingstone not having taken up said estate by succession, any personal obligation prestable against his father cannot be enforced against him by said charges, and they ought accordingly to be suspended.

The respondents pleaded ;—(2) The complainer Thomas F. F. Livingstone having succeeded to the security subjects, and the respondents' securities having transmitted against him, under and in terms of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, the complainers are liable to the diligence complained of, and suspension of said charges should be refused.*

On 12th June 1908 the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills (Guthrie) refused the note.†

* The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), enacts :—

Sec. 9. "A personal right to every estate in land descendible to heirs shall, without service or other procedure, vest or be held to have vested in the heir entitled to succeed thereto, by his survivorship of the person to whom he is entitled to succeed, . . . and such personal right shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be of the like nature, and be attended with the like consequences, and be transmissible in the same manner as a personal right to land under an unfeudalised conveyance, according to the existing law and practice."

Sec. 47. "Subject to the limitation hereinbefore provided as to the liability of an heir for the debts of his ancestor, an heritable security for money duly constituted upon an estate in land shall, together with any personal obligation to pay principal, interest, and penalty contained in the deed or instrument whereby the security is constituted, transmit against any person taking such estate by succession, gift, or bequest, or by conveyance, when an agreement to that effect appears in gremio of the conveyance, and shall be a burden upon his title in the same manner as it was upon that of his ancestor or author, without the necessity of a bond of corroboration or other deed or procedure ; and the personal obligation may be enforced against such person by summary diligence or otherwise, in the same manner as against the original debtor ; a warrant to charge may be applied for and validly granted in the Bill-Chamber or in a Sheriff Court in the form set forth in Schedule K hereto annexed. . . ."

Argued for the complainers;—The personal obligation in the bond was enforceable only against a person who had “taken” the estate by succession.¹ “Taking” involved the idea of doing something, either by making up a title, or by intromitting with the estate.² It would be a complete novelty to enforce such an obligation against a person in whom a personal title had vested by survivorship, but who had taken no steps to complete his title or to accept the succession. If mere survivorship were enough to effect this result, it would do away with the right of the heir to a period of six months in which to decide whether or not to make up a title. The respondents’ argument was inconsistent with section 13 of the Conveyancing Act, according to which the period when the title of an heir could be challenged commenced at the date of his infestment, and not the date of his predecessor’s death. Section 9 of the Act merely conferred the right to take up the succession. The charge should further be suspended on the ground that, even if the complainer be held to have taken the estate, he was liable only in so far as he was thereby lucratus,³ and that in fact he was not lucratus, the estate being insufficient to pay the debts secured upon it. This could competently be pleaded in the present action, and the complainer’s position was not prejudiced by the fact that he had not renounced the succession. Renunciation was an answer in an action of adjudication, but had no place in the present process. The respondents had mistaken their remedy, which was to sell the estate.

Fenton
Livingstone v.
Crichton’s
Trustees.

Argued for the respondents;—The object of section 9 of the Conveyancing Act was to abolish the gap between the date of the ancestor’s death and the date on which the heir took steps to complete his title, and to confer on the latter, as from the date of death, the rights in, and the correlative liabilities with respect to, the estate to which he succeeded. By the operation of that section, and by the mere father. He has not made up any title to his father’s estate. He has been charged by the respondents to pay the £2400 in the bond granted by his late father.

“The question of the complainer’s liability turns on the construction of section 47 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. If he has taken his father’s estate by succession in the sense of that section, then he is liable. But if, before the section can apply, an heir must make up a title to the estate, then he is not liable; for he has made up no title.

“Contrary to my first impression, I think the section applies. The expression ‘taking such estate by succession’ is capable of being read either actively as equivalent to ‘taking up the succession by making up a title thereto,’ or passively as equivalent to ‘becoming entitled to the succession.’ I prefer the latter reading. It seems to me that the scheme of the Act is, under section 9, to confer on an heir the benefit of a transmissible personal title to his ancestor’s estate without making up a title, and, under section 47, to impose on the heir the corresponding burden of liability for the debts of his ancestor, even although he has not made up a title. The reference in Schedule K to a person in the position of the complainer as ‘the present proprietor’ does not imply that a title has been made up. He has become proprietor by virtue of section 9 of the Act. See M’Adam, 6 R. 1256.”

He was the person described in Schedule K (which contained the statutory form of minute of charge in connection with section 47), as "the present proprietor of the lands"—"lands" including "any interest in land,"² such as the personal right conferred by section 9. Accordingly a person in whom a personal right had vested under section 9 was a person who had "taken" the estate by succession within the meaning of section 47. The case of Lamb,³ cited by the complainers, was an Outer-House decision, and the case of *M'Adam*⁴ was apparently not before the Court when it was argued. Neither under the Conveyancing Act, 1874, nor under the previous law, was completed infetment required in order to make an heir liable for his ancestor's debts. If he desired to escape this liability, it was necessary for him to renounce the succession. This was the law prior to 1874,⁵ and it had not been altered by section 12 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874. As the complainer had failed to renounce, he was liable for the whole debt.

At advising on 18th July 1908,—

LORD KINNEAR.—This is a note of suspension by Mr Thomas Fenton Livingstone, midshipman, a minor, and his curator bonis, of a charge to make payment to the respondents of two several sums of £1200 with interest. The ground of charge is that the complainer is the eldest son and heir-at-law of the late George Frederick Fenton Livingstone, who was proprietor of the estate of Easter Moffat, that the respondents are in right of a bond and disposition in security for £2400, granted over the estate by the father, and that the son as heir-at-law is by force of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 liable in the personal obligation undertaken by the father, so as to be subject to direct personal diligence for payment. The position of the estate is not, perhaps, material to the question, but I infer from statements on the record that the chargers, whose bond is postponed to two prior bonds for larger sums, do not expect to recover the full amount of their security from the estate, and therefore they desire to fix a personal liability on the complainer. The latter, however, has made up no title to the estate; he has not entered into possession or taken any advantage from it whatsoever; and the only ground on which he is said to be liable is that he stands in the relation of heir-at-law to the actual debtor. He is, in fact, the eldest son as well as the heir-at-law, but the ground on which his liability is alleged would obviously be equally applicable to any other heir of the investiture, however distant his blood relationship to the deceased might be, and however ignorant he might be of the succession. It is enough, according to the respondents' argument, to make any person liable by mere survivance for the debts of a deceased landowner if they are secured over the land, that the one should stand in the legal relation of heir-at-law to the other, or, as the Lord Ordinary puts it in his opinion, that he "becomes entitled" to the succession, whether he does anything to appropriate the succession, or derive any benefit from it or not. I must confess I should have had no difficulty in rejecting that proposition without hesitation, were it not for my respect for the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which is entitled to all the more weight because his Lordship explains that his conclusion is contrary to his own original opinion, and has therefore not been reached without consideration. I must confess, however, that my own original opinion was exactly the same as that of the Lord Ordinary, and that it is not shaken, but, on the contrary, confirmed, by further consideration of the clauses of the statute upon which the respondents' case is founded.

The respondents' argument is rested on sections 9 and 47 of the Conveyancing Act. The 9th provides that a "personal right to every estate in land descendible to heirs shall, without service or other procedure, vest or be held to have vested in the heir entitled to succeed thereto by his survivance of the person to whom he is entitled to succeed . . . and such personal right shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be of the like nature, and be attended with the like consequences, and be transmissible in the same manner as the personal right to land under an unfeudalised conveyance, according to the existing law and practice." The legal effect of that enactment is to my mind perfectly clear and simple. The heir-at-law, without making up a title, and, as the Lord President puts it in the case of M'Adam,¹ without even beginning to make up a title by serving heir to his predecessor, has by force of the statute a complete personal right to the lands. He is in the same position as if he had obtained a deed on which he might have been infeft but had not taken infeftment. He may therefore deal with the estate if he pleases as freely as any owner not infeft but standing on a good personal right. He may sell it or grant bonds over it to creditors. But all that will not make him liable for the debts of his predecessor, provided he does nothing to subject himself to such liability, either by taking up the estate formally by completing title or by taking possession of it and so incurring a passive representation. It is said that a person in this position is referred to in Schedule K as proprietor of the lands. That may or may not be a very apt expression for defining his position. It is unnecessary to consider whether it is so or not, because the statute itself has told us, in the enacting part of the clause, what is meant by the proprietor. It is a person having a personal right, who may have done nothing to make his personal right effectual. That entitles him to take the estate if he pleases, but it does not oblige him to do so. A disponee under a deed of conveyance does not become liable for the debts of the disponer on the mere delivery of the conveyance, and the legal position of the heir in whom a personal right is vested by mere survivance is exactly the same as that of such a disponee. So far, therefore, as the 9th section goes, I am unable to see that it advances the respondents' claim in any way.

But then they found upon the 47th section, and I think the true question between the parties arises out of that section. It provides

July 18, 1908. that subject to a certain limitation as to liability of an heir for the debts of his ancestor, "an heritable security for money duly constituted upon an estate in land shall, together with any personal obligation to pay principal, interest, and penalty contained in the deed or instrument whereby the security is constituted, transmit against any person taking such estate by succession, gift, or bequest, or by conveyance, when an agreement to that effect appears in gremio of the conveyance," and so on. Now, that is the clause upon which it is said that mere survivance of a person who has effected a security over his estate will subject his heir-at-law to direct personal diligence without any steps being taken to constitute a debt against him, and without his having done anything to indicate that he has taken over the debt or the estate of his ancestor who originally undertook the liability. The whole question seems to me to depend on what is meant by words that are perfectly plain words according to our legal language. What is meant by "taking the succession"? The Lord Ordinary says it means to become entitled to a succession. I cannot give that meaning to the words even taking them as words of ordinary language, because it is one thing to become entitled to a right and another to take it, and if a person who becomes entitled does not desire to take it, he may let it alone with all the encumbrances with which it is affected. But it is in truth a term of legal language, and if we come to the first book which naturally suggests itself to one as an authority for ascertaining how successions are to be taken up and how a successor is subjected in liability for his predecessor's debt—I mean Mr Bell's Principles—we find that in starting his exposition of the law of passive representation he uses exactly the phrase of the statute, and says a person may become liable for his ancestor's debts by taking the hereditas, which is only substituting the Latin word for the English one—by taking the succession he will be liable for his ancestor's debts; and he goes on to explain how he may take the succession so as to have that effect. The methods by which he undertakes that liability are, of course, perfectly well known and elementary. He may make up a title or he may take benefit from the estate so as to subject him to passive representation; but if he holds aloof from it and does nothing, there is no ground in law, so far as I can see, for saying that he has become subject to personal diligence for the debts of a man whose property he has not taken up and may not intend to take up. I am therefore very clearly of opinion that the interlocutor which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced is not well founded, and that the charge is baseless and must be suspended. I say nothing at all as to the other remedies which may be open to the respondents. What the proper proceedings may be for realising the subject of their security, or attaching the other estate of their debtor, are questions for them to consider. They are not before the Court; but so far as this charge is concerned I am of opinion that the statute gives them no right to use personal diligence against the complainer.

LORD MACKENZIE.—In my opinion the complainer has not taken the estate by succession within the meaning of sec. 47 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and therefore cannot be charged to pay the sums contained in the bond granted by his late father. He has not made up a title to the estate, nor has he subjected himself to the responsibilities of an heir by any July 18, 1908.

passive title. He has done nothing. In these circumstances, I am unable to take the view that he has subjected himself to personal diligence.

It was said that this liability attaches to the complainer because of the operation of sec. 9, by which a personal right to the estate vested in him by mere survivance. This personal right, however, is by the section declared to be of the like nature and to be attended by the like consequences, and to be transmissible in the same manner, as a personal right to land under an unfendalised conveyance, according to the existing law and practice. If this be so it cannot involve the consequence for which the respondents contend.

I am accordingly of opinion that the charges should be suspended.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in Lord Kinnear's opinion. We recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustain the third plea in law, which is the ground on which he proceeded, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to pass the note and to give decree for expenses.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to sustain the third plea in law for the complainers, to pass the note of suspension, and to proceed as accords.

July 18, 1908. Alexander Simpson. The matter was referred to the arbitration of the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire, at Hamilton (Thomson), who refused compensation and, at the request of the applicant, stated a case for appeal.

Hendry v.
United Collieries, Limited.

The case set forth :—"The following facts were admitted or proved:—(1) That the said Alexander Simpson was in the employment of the respondents as a miner on 9th July 1907; (2) that on said date he was knocked down by a train of waggons which were being shunted on the respondents' premises, and received injuries from which he died on 14th July following; (3) that his mother, the said deceased Mrs Marion Wilson or Simpson, who was as is averred dependent upon the said Alexander Simpson, died upon the 16th October 1907, without making any claim upon the respondents for the death of her son; (4) that a claim was first made on 10th December 1907, and was at the instance of the present applicant; (5) that shortly after the accident the present applicant's husband called on the respondents' cashier and inquired whether the accident had been reported and was informed that it had, and on his calling again a few days later he was informed that the respondents considered that no compensation was due in respect of the accident: That it is not proved that he was then acting on the instructions of his mother-in-law: That he made no claim nor intimated any intention to make a claim either on behalf of his mother-in-law or of the present applicant.

"In these circumstances I found that the applicant, as executrix of the said Mrs Marion Wilson or Simpson, had no title to take proceedings for compensation under the Act, and I therefore assoilzied the respondents, with expenses."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was :—"Whether, in the circumstances above set forth, the right of the mother of the deceased workman to make a claim and to take proceedings under the Act vested in the applicant so as to entitle her to insist in the present application?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 26th and 27th May 1908.

Argued for the applicant and appellant;—As soon as a workman died from the result of an accident leaving a dependant, a right to a specific sum as compensation vested in that dependant in virtue of sec. 1 (1) of the Act of 1906 and the First Schedule thereto, sec. 1 (a) (i). If that right vested it transmitted in ordinary course to his representatives on his death, and could be enforced by them. Such an interpretation was doing no violence to the words of the Act, for there was no provision in the Act limiting the right of recovery to the dependant himself. Nor was there anything in the Act to limit for an injury shall not be maintainable unless . . . the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury, or, in case of death, within six months from the time of death."

First Schedule. (1) "The amount of compensation under this Act shall be—"(a) where death results from injury—

"(i) if the workman leaves any dependants wholly dependent upon his earnings, a sum equal to his earnings in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury, or the sum of One hundred and fifty pounds, whichever of those sums is the larger, but not exceeding in any case Three hundred pounds. . . ."

the transmission of this right to cases where the dependant had him- July 18, 1908.
self made a claim during his lifetime. There was no analogy between a claim for compensation under this Act and an actio personalis, and therefore the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona had no application. The right to compensation was a right conferred by statute; it was really a civil debt, and bore no analogy to an actio personalis arising out of delict.¹ No doubt O'Donovan v. Cameron, *Swan, & Co.*² was against the appellant's contention, yet that case was not binding in Scotland, and it had been doubted in Darling- *ton.*³ The views expressed in *Darlington*³ were sound, and should be followed.

Hendry v.
United Collieries,
Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—It was a false construction of the Act to say that by its provisions a right to a specific sum vested in a dependant on survivance of the injured workman. All that the Act did was to create a contingent liability in the employer to pay compensation, the contingency being that the compensation should be claimed. The claim, too, must be definite, it must be for a specific sum.⁴ Without a claim no specific sum vested in a dependant, as was clear from secs. 5 and 8 of the First Schedule, which provided for the allocation of the compensation fund amongst the dependants.
Further, the appellant was not a person entitled to claim under the Act. The persons entitled to claim were defined in sec. 13 of the Act, viz., the dependants. There was no mention in the Act of representatives of dependants. The decision in *O'Donovan*² was directly applicable here, and should be followed, and that decision was to the effect that the making of a claim by the dependant was a condition precedent.⁵ In spite of the remarks made in *Darlington*⁶ the weight of the decision in *O'Donovan*² was not really shaken in the later case, for there a claim had been made. The contention for the appellant was directly opposed to the policy and intention of the Act, which was to provide compensation as an alimentary fund to the dependants, not to give it to those who were not dependants, and might in fact be persons of independent means.

At advising on 18th July 1908,—

LORD KINNEAR.—I have found this to be a question of difficulty not only because there is a difference of opinion on the Bench, but because I am unable to follow a judgment of very high authority pronounced by the Court of Appeal in Ireland in the case of O'Donovan v. Cameron, Swan, *& Company.*³ But the question is the same as that which has arisen under the 1st section of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897 when read along with the 1st section of the First Schedule; and the true construction of that enactment is, in my opinion, that adopted by the Court of Appeal in Darlington v. Roscoe,⁶ with which, if I may respectfully say so, I

July 18, 1908. entirely concur. The condition of fact upon which the question arises is, as I understand it, exactly the same, because the sole dependant who would have been entitled to compensation for the death of a workman has died before compensation could be awarded, and a claim is now made by her representative. With reference to such a state of things the Master of the Rolls in the case I have referred to, after reading the sections which I have mentioned, says,—“It appears to me that these enactments give to the person wholly dependent on the deceased workman a statutory right to a quantified sum by way of compensation for the death of the workman. There is no action at all, nor is it a question of any wrong done by the employer, for the accident may not have happened through any negligence of his, or for which he was responsible. The statute confers upon the dependant, under the given conditions, a right to be paid by the employer a measured sum of money, the amount of which is quite irrespective of any probabilities as to duration of life or other such considerations, which might involve the making of elaborate calculations. . . . It appears to me that a statutory right to this ascertained sum accrued to the widow in her lifetime and passed to the respondent as her legal personal representative.” Now, if there is a statutory right to a sum of money accrued, I am unable to see any ground in law for holding that it does not transmit to the representative of the person to whom it accrued. It is a right to a sum of money given, not by way of solatium to an injured person, but for the benefit of the personal estate of the dependant who has suffered a patrimonial loss by the death of the person on whom she depended, and according to our law I hold it to be quite settled that a right of that kind once vested as a moveable claim passes to the personal representatives or to assignees.

I do not think it necessary to examine the authorities in detail, because the principle I have stated is elementary; but I refer in general to the opinion of Lord Neaves in Auld v. Shairp,¹ because that opinion was cited by Lord Watson in Darling v. Gray & Sons,² as a sound exposition of the law of Scotland, and I take the result of it to be that even where a claim is made by way of compensation for a personal wrong it is a claim which according to our law transmits to the representatives of the claimant and against the representatives of the wrongdoer. The decision comes to this, that a civil debt is transmissible to executors. Lord Neaves was dealing there with a case which, I agree with his Lordship in the chair, is not that which arises here, because it was an action in respect of a wrong done by the defender, but then I think the exposition of the general law is none the less valuable or the less apt in its bearing upon the present discussion, because the point of the judgment was that the transmissibility of such a right of action depends upon the same law as that of an ordinary civil debt; and we are relieved from any difficulty which might otherwise have been supposed to arise as to the extent to which the law so laid down should be qualified in construing a statute, applicable to England and Scotland alike, by the doctrine embodied in the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona, since it appears from the decision in Darlington v. Roscoe,³ that, even in the law of England where that maxim is accepted, it has no bearing on the question of the Workmen's Compensation Act. As Lord Watson points out, it is only to a very limited extent that that maxim has been recognised in Scotland, but so far as I understand it, I am very clearly of opinion that it has no bearing, because it is applicable only to actions arising out of a wrong. In the case of a person injured by a legal wrong, if the person injured dies, his claim does not transmit to his representatives; if the wrongdoer dies, the claim against him does not transmit against his representatives. I have no difficulty in holding with the learned Judges in England that that is not a rule of law which can be applicable to the right given to a workman under the Compensation Act. That is not technically a right of action, and it arises independently altogether of any wrong. It is statutory compensation for a patrimonial loss.

Hendry v.
United Collieries,
Limited.
Lord Kinnear.

But then, if that maxim does not apply, I am unable to see any plausible ground for holding that a vested right in the compensation money does not transmit. I confess I am not moved by any consideration as to the policy of the statute, because while I entirely agree that the persons favoured by this statute are the immediate dependants of the workman, and not any remoter relations or any dependants of theirs, the question is not Who are the persons favoured by the Act, but What is the character of the right which the Act has conferred upon them? If it is a right to a sum of money which vests as a moveable right, then under our law it transmits, and we cannot deny the effect of a settled doctrine of law from deference to any speculation as to the purpose of the Legislature in conferring a particular benefit.

But the question remains, which it was not necessary to decide in *Darlington v. Roscoe*¹—and it is one which, to my mind, is more difficult because of the judgment in the Irish case of *O'Donovan*²—whether it is not a condition precedent that a claim shall be made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury. I think it is a condition precedent to the institution of statutory proceedings for obtaining an award, but not precedent to the vested right. It is not so expressed. The first clause, which creates the liability, and therefore the corresponding right, is absolute in its terms, and when read along with the clause in the section which fixes a specific compensation in a particular case, it amounts to the creation in favour of a person defined of an absolute right to a definite sum of money. That a right so conferred should vest so as to be transmissible, and yet that the person in whom it has vested should be required to take proceedings within a definite time in order to make it effectual, is a condition which is perfectly familiar to our law. There is a familiar instance in the Triennial Act. A creditor in certain debts must bring his action within three years, otherwise “he shall have no action.” It is exactly the same kind of enactment as that of the Compensation Act, that proceedings shall not be maintainable unless made within six months. But no one ever doubted that the creditor's right, although it must be enforced within a certain time, was nevertheless transmissible to his executors, subject always to the same condition as to the time when an action might be brought.

² [1901] 2 I. R. 633.

July 18, 1908. Accordingly it seems to me that the vesting of the right is not affected by the condition as to procedure.

Hendry v.
United Collieries,
Limited.

Lord Kinnear.

It is said that this is a claim which must be made by the dependant himself, that it can only be made by a living dependant, and therefore that when the dependant has died there is nobody to make it. I am unable so to read the words. The condition is that proceedings are not to be maintainable unless the claim for compensation shall be made within six months. It must be made, of course, by the person entitled to make it, but if it should be held that it is a vested right which is transmissible to executors, there is nothing in the words which will not be satisfied if the executor makes the claim. The question as to the force of the condition really depends upon the meaning of the section creating the right. If it means that a right shall accrue, but that proceedings must be taken within six months, that condition will be satisfied if they are taken within that time by the person in whom the right is then vested. If it means that no right shall accrue unless and until a claim shall be made, and that within six months, it follows that no right passes to the representatives of a dependant who has not made a claim. I prefer the former view, although, for the reason I have stated, I cannot hold it with confidence. I am therefore unable to agree with your Lordship in the chair and the Sheriff, and I think the question which the Sheriff puts to us must be answered in the affirmative.

LORD MACKENZIE.—Alexander Simpson, a miner, met with an accident on 9th July 1907, while in the employment of the United Collieries, Limited, and received injuries from which he died on 14th July following.

The mother of the deceased, who was, as is averred, dependent on him, died upon 16th October 1907 without making any claim for compensation. A claim was first made under the Act of 1906, on 10th December 1907, by the present appellant, who is the executrix of the mother of the deceased.

The question in the case is "Whether, in the circumstances above set forth, the right of the mother of the deceased workman to make a claim and to take proceedings under the Act vested in the applicant so as to entitle her to insist in the present application?"

The statute, by section 1 (1) and the First Schedule, section 1 (a), imposes an obligation upon the employer, subject as thereafter mentioned, to make payment of compensation. The liability is one not founded upon contract or delict. It does not require to be established in an action. The compensation, in the case of the death of the workman leaving any dependants dependent upon his earnings, is to be paid as a capital sum. This is not calculated with reference to the expectation of life of the dependant. The liability to pay, once the right has vested, is the same whether the dependant survives the workman days or years.

The contention of the respondents is that no right in this capital sum, the amount of which is fixed by the Legislature, accrues to the dependant unless and until, in terms of section 2, "the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made, in the case of death, within six months of the time of death." It appears to me that the purpose of this section was to protect employers from claims which had been deferred for an indefinite period. The claim for compensation in the present case was made within six months of the time of death, therefore what would appear July 18, 1908. to me to be the purpose of the section has been served. The respondents, however, say that no right to receive the compensation which they are liable to pay vests, unless the claim is made by the dependant himself or herself, and that, therefore, if the dependant dies without having made a claim, his or her representative cannot do so. The contrary view, that the right does vest, although subject to a limitation, is one not unfamiliar to the law of Scotland. A vested right may be subject to limitation imposed either by convention or statute. An example of this is the limitation attached by statute to cautionary obligations. It seems more likely that it was intended that the right to compensation should vest from the time of death, so as to form a fund of credit. The necessities of the dependant commence with the death. There seems to be no sufficient reason why the right to compensation should not vest at the same date.

It was said that the applicant here was not one of the persons who, under the statute, could make a claim. Section 13 declares that "any reference to a workman who has been injured shall, where the workman is dead, include a reference to his legal personal representative, or to his dependants or other person to whom or for whose benefit compensation is payable." The contention is that the omission of any reference to the personal representatives of the dependants excludes the idea that it was intended they could make "the claim for compensation" under section 2. The omission of any reference to the representatives of the dependants is quite consistent with the idea that the statute vests a right to compensation in the dependant by survivance of the workman. Any rights which they obtained under the Act would, without any statutory provision, be vindicated by their executors or assignees under the ordinary law. Nor are sections (5), (7), and (8) of the First Schedule, which provide for the apportionment of the compensation partly to total and partly to partial dependants, contrary to the theory of vesting. There may be vesting in a class, subject to variation as regards the extent of the interest taken by each member of the class.

The fallacy at the root of the respondents' argument appears to me to be the supposition that the claim for compensation, which is made in order to compel performance of a statutory duty, is analogous to an action in which damages are sought on the ground of delict. The two are not analogous. They are brought into contrast by the Act itself, e.g., in section 1 (4), which provides—"If within the time hereinafter in this Act limited for taking proceedings an action is brought to recover damages independently of this Act." So also in section 6. Upon this *Powell v. Main Colliery Company*¹ may be referred to. It was there held that the claim for compensation does not mean the initiation of proceedings before the tribunal by which the compensation is to be assessed, but a notice of claim for compensation, which does not require to be in any prescribed form, sent to the workman's employer.

In the Irish case of In re O'Donovan v. Cameron, Swan, & Company,² (under the 1897 Act), it was held, in circumstances similar to the present, that because no claim for compensation, as required by section 2 had been made during the dependant's lifetime, a claim could not be made by the dependant's legal personal representative. With all deference to the opinions expressed in that case, I am unable, for the reasons stated, to reach this result.

In the case of *Darlington v. Roscoe & Sons*¹ (also under the 1897 Act) the dependant made a claim under the Act of 1897, but died before any award was made in respect of that claim, and it was held that the right of compensation survived, and passed to the legal personal representative of the dependant. This case was therefore distinguishable from that of O'Donovan.² The opinions, however, expressed in Darlington,¹ as I read them, support the view that the right to compensation accrued to the mother in her lifetime, and passed to the appellant as her legal personal representative. There is no material difference between the 1897 and the 1906 Acts as regards this question.

I am therefore of opinion that the question should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD M'LAREN.—I regret that I am unable to concur in the opinions which have been delivered, but as my opinion will not affect the judgment of the Court, I shall confine myself to a brief statement of the grounds on which I conceive that the respondents are not liable to pay compensation money to the appellant.

My opinion is founded mainly on the view I take of the policy of the Act of Parliament, which, as I think, was not intended to constitute any general obligation on the part of employers to pay a sum of money in respect of the death of an employee from accident arising in the course of his service, but was only intended to secure to those who were dependent on his earnings compensation for pecuniary loss which they might sustain by being deprived of the support which they had been in use to receive from their deceased relative.

It is true that where compensation has been awarded to a dependant who dies before he or she has been able to make use of the money, the compensation money, or what remains unexpended, will pass to the executors as part of the deceased's estate; but that is only because in the case of death resulting from an accident the compensation is given in the shape of a capital sum, and where the sum has been awarded it vests in the dependant, and is assignable and transmissible to executors or next of kin. If a claim is made within the statutory period, and the dependant dies before an award has been made, I should consider that a right to an award of compensation had vested in the dependant, and that a right to follow out the proceedings in the arbitration passed to the legal personal representative, because a vested right is property and is transmissible as such. But then I think it is a condition of the dependant's right to compensation that he shall make a claim within the statutory period, and if he does not choose to make a claim, or if he is prevented by death from making a claim, the employer's liability (which is contingent on a claim being made) comes to an end. In this case the claim was made within the prescribed period, but it was not made by the dependant, but by her executrix, and I cannot find in the July 18, 1908. language of the statute that a claim is allowed to anyone other than the dependant. The appellant does not profess to have been dependent on the earnings of the deceased miner; she sustained no loss through his death, and her claim does not seem to me to fall within the scope or object of the statute, which is to provide compensation to those who have suffered. The distinction may be illustrated by supposing the case of a workman who is survived by more than one dependant. One of the dependants dies without having made a claim. I should have thought that in such a case the compensation money would go to the surviving dependants, but according to the decision proposed this would not be a good award unless a share of the money were allotted to the next of kin or executor-dative of the deceased dependant—a person who had not suffered, and who might not be in want.

Lord M'Laren.

On this question the decisions of the English and Irish Courts are conflicting. My opinion has the support of the Appeal Court of Ireland in the case of O'Donovan,¹ but I do not wish to be understood as concurring in their Lordships' decision in so far as it is founded on a rule of law expressed by the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona. I do not think that a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act can be described as actio personalis, and I see difficulty in extending the maxim by a supposed analogy to cases of this description, because the maxim is merely a statement of an arbitrary rule without the necessary limitations, and because it does not embody anything that I can recognise as a principle capable of extension to cognate cases.

My opinion in the case of Bern,² which was referred to in the arguments in this case, did not proceed on the assumption that this law maxim had been recognised as a rule of practice by the Scottish Courts. My opinion was founded partly on the Roman law, which in the passages quoted from the Digest negatived the right of the representatives of an injured person to prosecute the actio injuriarum, partly on the absence of any authority in our own law which could support such a claim, but also on the inconvenience and injustice of allowing representatives to make a claim which the injured person might have good reasons for not preferring in his own name.

I do not consider that the case of *Darlington*³ is conclusive one way or the other, because it only decides that a claim which has been made by the deceased dependant may be followed to its conclusion by the representatives, and that, I think, is a sound interpretation of the statute. While it may be that the authority of the case of *O'Donovan*¹ is somewhat shaken by the observations of the learned Judges in Darlington's case,³ I am of opinion that the claim is not well founded, and that the judgment of the arbitrator is right.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative, recalled the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbiter, and remitted to him to proceed as accords.

Charitable and Educational Bequests and Trusts—Uncertainty—“Societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable nature.”—A testatrix directed her trustee or trustees to apportion and pay over the proceeds of the residue of her estate “amongst such societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable nature in such proportions as he or they shall in their own discretion think proper.”

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Johnston) that the bequest was to be construed as a bequest in favour of charitable societies and institutions, and was not void from uncertainty.

1st Division.
Ld. Johnston.

MRS MARGARET BAILLIE OR HAY, who resided at Holmwood, Uddingston, died on 29th December 1898, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby she conveyed her whole estate to William Jackson Andrew and another, as trustees for the purposes therein set forth.

The last purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement was as follows:—“In the last place, I direct my trustees or trustee on the death of the survivor of me and the said Margaret M'Donald to apportion and pay over the free proceeds of the whole residue of my means and estate, after giving effect to the above provisions, to and amongst such societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable nature in such proportions as he or they shall in their own discretion think proper, but excluding all societies or institutions either connected with the Roman Catholic body or under the control or management or even general management of those connected with that body.”

Margaret M'Donald, who was liferented in a portion of the estate, survived the testatrix and died on 5th January 1905. On her death the residue of the estate was set free to be distributed by the trustees.

A doubt having been expressed as to whether the bequest of the residue was not void from uncertainty, the trustees were advised that they would not be in safety to distribute the residue until the validity of the bequest had been determined by the Court. Accordingly, on 19th January 1907, they brought an action of multipoleinding, to which the whole heirs ab intestato of the testatrix were called as defenders, for the purpose of determining the disposal of the residue of the estate which formed the fund in medio.

A claim was lodged for the trustees (the pursuers and real raisers) in which they maintained that the residuary bequest was valid and should receive effect, and claimed “to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio in order that the same may be administered by them in terms of the residuary clause of said trust-disposition and settlement; or, alternatively, in order that they may administer and divide the same amongst such of the testatrix's heirs in mobilibus as may be found thereto entitled.”

They pleaded;—(1) Said bequest of residue being valid and falling to receive effect, the claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio in terms of their primary claim. (2) In any event, the claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred thereto for the purpose of administration in terms of their alternative claim.

July 18, 1908,
Hay's
Trustees v.
Baillie,

Claims were also lodged for certain of the heirs ab intestato, who maintained that the bequest of the residue of the estate was void from uncertainty, and that it had accordingly fallen into intestacy, and fell to be distributed among the heirs ab intestato of the testatrix.

On 14th November 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) pronounced an interlocutor finding that the bequest in dispute was void from uncertainty, and therefore sustaining the claims for the defenders, and ranking and preferring the pursuers and real raisers to the fund in medio in terms of their alternative claim.*

* "OPINION.—The late Mrs Hay of Holmwood, Uddingston, directed her trustees to apportion and pay over the free portion of the residue of her estate 'to or amongst such societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable nature in such proportions' as in their discretion they should think proper, but always to the exclusion of Roman Catholic societies or institutions. The validity of this bequest is challenged by the testator's next of kin, who maintain that it is void on the ground of uncertainty, in respect that though 'charitable' has, since the case of Crichton in 1828, 3 W. & S. 329, been recognised as sufficiently descriptive of a class of objects or institutions to receive effect in discretionary bequests of this nature, the alternative word 'benevolent' is not so descriptive, and has not been so recognised.

"The trustees, who support the bequest, did not, I think, go the length of maintaining that 'benevolent' and 'charitable,' taken by themselves as words in common use in the English language, are identical in meaning.

"But, I think, I may state their contention as embraced in these three propositions:—

"(First) That in the collocation of words used by the testatrix the disjunctive 'or' must be read as equivalent to the conjunctive 'and.'

"(Second) That 'benevolent' is identical with 'charitable,' or, at least, is used by the testatrix as equivalent to 'charitable,' so that the use of both words is a mere redundancy or surplusage.

"(Third) That the law of Scotland shews such favour to charitable bequests that to give effect to the bequest it will read 'benevolent or charitable' as intended to express no more than charitable—in fact, appeal is made to the principle of benignant interpretation of charitable bequests.

"Taking these points in their order:—

"(First) It is true that the conjunctive 'and' is sometimes read as having the same effect as the disjunctive 'or.' I cannot better illustrate this construction than by comparing the two cases of Cobb's Trustees, 1894, 21 R. 638, and Williams v. Kershaw, 1835, 42 R. R. 269. In Cobb's case the words were 'useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions.' In Williams v. Kershaw they were 'benevolent, charitable, and religious purposes.' In the former case the three adjectives were capable in natural combination of qualifying the same institutions, and there was no call therefore to read the 'and' as otherwise than conjunctive. Whereas in the latter case the three qualifications were not naturally found combined in the same institutions, and therefore to give a reasonable interpretation to the adjectives in combination, it was necessary to read the 'and' as distributive and not conjunctive, and that necessity is the only justification of the interpretation—(see Lord Rutherford Clark in Cobb's case at page 641). But where the distributive 'or' is used there can never be the similar necessity for interpreting it as conjunctive. If the qualifying adjectives are merely equivalents, it does not matter whether they are connected conjunctively or disjunctively. If they are not mere equivalents, but being distinctive in July 18, 1908.

Hay's
Trustees v.
Baillie.

The claimants, the pursuers and real raisers, reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 2d and 3d July 1908.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) It could not be disputed that if the word "charitable" alone had been used, the bequest would have been good.¹ But in the phrase "benevolent or charitable" the use of "or" was really conjunctive, not disjunctive. The words were in fact employed as synonymous or as exegetical of one another, and not for the purpose of describing institutions of a distinctive character. It was impossible to draw any distinction between "charitable" and "benevolent." The interpretations that had been put upon the word "charitable" were equally applicable to "benevolent."² The use of the words as qualifying "institutions" emphasised the view that they were synonymous or exegetical. The phrase was, in fact, equivalent to "benevolent and charitable," and that phrase had again and again been construed as forming a good bequest.³ (2) Even if meaning, are capable of alternative use, there is no necessity to construe the distributive 'or' in any other than its natural meaning, and every reason for construing it in that meaning. And this, I think, will apply, even though the adjectives disjunctively used have, in part, a common sense—that is, to a certain extent, overlap.

"I cannot therefore read 'or' as equivalent to 'and.' No instance was quoted to me in which this has been done.

"Nor do I think it possible to accept the argument in an alternative form, viz.:—that the terms 'benevolent' and 'charitable' are merely exegetical of one another. So to read them would be to go against a cardinal canon of interpretation of such documents. It would be to deny to each word its natural and ordinary meaning, without any compelling reason. Presumably when a testatrix says 'benevolent' she means benevolent, and when she says 'or charitable' she means something different from benevolent. Moreover, which word is exegetical of the other? It must be contended that it is 'charitable' which is exegetical of 'benevolent,' as the latter comes first—as if the lady had said 'benevolent' and then caught herself up, seeing that she had used too wide a word, and added 'by which I mean charitable.' I cannot think it possible to put such a gloss upon her words, without finding an intention for her by my own surmise, and not from the words she uses.

"(Second) Is 'benevolent' equivalent to 'charitable'? I think not. I think it may be said that everything which is 'charitable' is 'benevolent,' as the less is included in the greater. But I do not think that everything 'benevolent' can be included in the term 'charitable,' whether that term be used in the more technical English sense, or in the less technical Scottish sense. On the contrast between the two words, I refer to Lord Bramwell's judgment in Pemsel's case, L. R., [1891] A. C. 531.

"I approach this question from the point of view expressed by Sir William Grant, M. R., in Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 7 R. R. 232, where he says, 'the question is not whether the trustees may not apply it upon purposes strictly charitable, but whether he is bound so to apply it.' This has been repeatedly stated by other Judges, and cannot be controverted. If then 'benevolent' covers more than 'charitable,' though the trustees might "or" was to be read in its disjunctive sense, the word "benevolent" July 18, 1908. was in itself sufficient to constitute a good bequest. All that was necessary was, in the words of Lord Chancellor Loreburn,¹ that the description should be sufficiently certain to enable men of common-sense to carry out the expressed wishes of the testator.² "Benevolent" satisfied that test. For the reasons already given it was practically indistinguishable from "charitable," and "charitable" admittedly satisfied the test. The Scottish cases where the disjunctive addition of another descriptive word had been held to vitiate such a bequest were all cases where the additional word was wider and vaguer in its significance than "benevolent."³ The English cases⁴ founded on by the Lord Ordinary were not authoritative in Scotland, for they turned on the technical rules of interpretation of charitable bequests in England, based on the statute of Elizabeth.⁵ There was no question of the power of the Court in Scotland to put a benevolent construc-

Hay's
Trustees v.
Baillie.

confine themselves to what was strictly charitable, that would not support the bequest, if they need not so restrict themselves, and might apply the funds committed to them to what is benevolent, but not charitable. And if benevolent is not descriptive of a particular class of which the law can take cognisance, the bequest must, according to the now well-established rule, fail.

"The term 'benevolent' has occurred in a number of cases in Scotland and England (1) by itself, (2) along with 'charitable' or other terms used conjunctively, and (3) along with charitable or other terms used disjunctively. Where used by itself and where used disjunctively it has been rejected as indefinite, but where used conjunctively it has been sustained as not vitiating the bequest, provided its colleague is sufficiently definite, on the ground that if a purpose is, for instance, charitable, and therefore in the eye of the law definite, it does not render it indefinite that it must be not only charitable but also benevolent—ça va sans dire, though the converse may not hold true.

"But before referring to the cases, a word as to the applicability of English cases in this question. I shall, under the third head, have to consider the specialties of the English law with regard to charities. But I find nothing in it which precludes English authorities, on this particular aspect of the question, being received in Scotland. Both in England and in Scotland 'charitable' is accepted as in the eye of the law sufficiently descriptive of a particular class of purposes to be definite. There may be a question whether the limits of the class are quite the same in the law of the two countries, and I think, notwithstanding a certain generality of statement on the subject sometimes found, that they are narrower in Scotland rather than the reverse. But I apprehend that the question, whether another descriptive term not 'charitable' is sufficiently definite, or is too indefinite to be recognised, is the same question, whether it arises in Scotland or in England, and I am therefore prepared to accept English decisions

Trustees v.
Baillie.

Argued for the respondents;—The rule of law as to giving effect to such bequests was the same in England and Scotland, and was as follows:—A testator could not delegate the making of his will to third parties. But if he described a class of purposes of a sufficiently definite and restricted character, and appointed persons to select within that class, the bequest would be good. One class of purposes had, by decision, been artificially established as sufficiently definite and restricted, and that was "charitable" purposes. To bring this bequest, therefore, within those which the Court would uphold, it must be shewn either to fall within the region of "charitable" purposes, or else to be for a class of objects sufficiently defined and restricted. This bequest satisfied neither of these requisites. (1) It was not for a "charitable" purpose. The use of the word "or" was on that point, not as authorities indeed, but as guides which I should hesitate to discard.

"(1) In James v. Allen, 17 R. R. 4, the word 'benevolent' was used by itself, and Sir William Grant, M. R., holding that 'though many charitable institutions are very properly called "benevolent," it is impossible to say that every object of a man's benevolence is also an object of his charity,' determined, that as the property might, consistently with the will, be applied to other than strictly charitable purposes, the trust was too indefinite for the Court to execute, and could not receive effect. I acknowledge that by 'charitable' purposes he means those purposes which are specified 'in the statute of Queen Elizabeth,' or which have been held to be within the analogies of that statute, but, as already stated, I find these purposes at any rate no narrower than 'charitable purposes' as understood in Scotland.

"In the preceding case of Morice v. Bishop of Durham, supra, where the expression used was 'objects of benevolence and liberality,' the same conclusion had been reached. Sir William Grant, M. R., points out, what is as true in Scotland as in England, that the general rule is that every trust must have a definite object, but that this doctrine does not hold good with regard to trusts for charity. 'It is now settled,' he says, 'upon authority, which it is too late to controvert, that where a charitable purpose is expressed, however general, the bequest shall not fail on account of the uncertainty of the object,' and the words might, since the case of Crichton, supra, have been used by a Scottish Judge. But then, he asks, 'Is this a trust for charity? Do objects of liberality and benevolence mean the same as objects of charity?' And these questions he answers in the negative.

"There is a further passage in Lord Eldon's judgment in that case which has an important bearing on the present. 'The principle upon which that trust' (referring to Broune v. Yeall, 6 R. R. 78) 'was ill-declared is this: As it is a maxim that the execution of a trust shall be under the control of the Court, it must be of such a nature that it can be under that control, so that the administration of it can be reviewed by the Court; or if the trustee dies the Court itself can execute the trust; a trust, therefore, which in case of maladministration could be reformed, and a due administration directed; and unless the subjects and the objects can be ascertained upon principles familiar in other cases, it must be decided that the Court can neither reform maladministration nor direct a due administration. That is the principle of that case.' Now, although the Court in Scotland has not developed its Chancery jurisdiction on such precise and perhaps technical lines as that in England, and although it has not been so ready to interfere in trust matters disjunctive,¹ and extended the bequest beyond the limits of charitable July 18, 1908.

institutions to the wider and vaguer region of benevolent institutions, Hay's and thus rendered the bequest void. That had been definitely decided Trustees v.
in England.² So too in In re MacDuff,³ where the word was "philanthropic," a word of narrower significance than "benevolent," the Baillie.
bequest was held to be bad. With these cases fell to be contrasted In re Best,⁴ where the use of the conjunctive "and benevolent" was interpreted as meaning "such charitable purposes as are benevolent," and was therefore held to form a good bequest. (2) If "benevolent" was not synonymous with "charitable," it was in its own nature, on the authority of the cases already cited, not sufficiently definite and restricted to make the bequest good. Therefore the matter was foreclosed by English decisions, and the reclaimers had been able to cite no Scottish authorities to the opposite effect. There was no reason, founded on the technical rules of interpretation of the word "charias the Court of Chancery does, by way of suits for administration and otherwise (see Lewin on Trusts, ch. 24, sec. 2 (15) and (16) 11th Edn., p. 753, and compare the Irish case of Hagan v. Duff, 23 L. R. Ir. 516), it does intervene in its own way to correct abuses, prevent diversion, and settle and alter schemes. And I conceive that the principle enunciated by Lord Eldon is just as applicable in Scotland as in England, and that the reason why a trust for an indefinite purpose is refused effect in Scotland as in England is just because the Court could not control its execution if called upon.

"(2) Again 'benevolent' and 'charitable' in conjunction have been sustained on the ground that the 'charitable' bequest was not vitiated by the further qualification of 'benevolent,' as in Hill v. Burns, 1826, 2 W. & S. 80; Millar v. Black's Trustees, 2 S. & M. 866; Cobb's Trustees, 1894, 21 R. 638; and In re Best (1904), 2 Ch. 354, and compare In re Sutton, L. R., 28 Ch. Div. 464, where 'charitable' is qualified by 'and deserving.'

"With reference to the case of Cobb, I am bound to notice that Lord Trayner would appear to regard 'benevolent' and 'charitable' as synonymous. But I can hardly consider what he says as a judgment to that effect, but rather as the acceptance of an assumed admission. I say assumed, because I think the argument was misconceived, and that no such admission was made. It was admitted that, standing the authority of Hill v. Burns, supra, no objection could be maintained to the expression 'benevolent' and 'charitable' in conjunction. Such argument as could be submitted was based on the adjection of the word 'useful,' upon which necessarily the whole stress was laid in support of the contention that the 'and' should be read distributively.

"(3) Where 'benevolent' has been connected by the distributive 'or' with 'charitable,' the effect has been held to be destructive of the definiteness of the trust purposes—Williams v. Kershaw, 1835, 42 R. R. 269; In re Jarman's Estate, L. R., 8 Chancery Division, 584; In re Riland's, 1881, W. N. 173.

"In these cases the same conclusion of indefiniteness or failure to particularise the class intended to be benefited was reached which led to the judgments in the analogous cases of Ellis v. Selby, 43 R. R. 188, where the expression was 'charitable or other purposes'; Duncan v. Blair, 3 F. 374 and 4 F. (H. L.) 1, where the expression was 'charitable or public'; and

What the Court had to look at was the "objects" of the institutions, not the fact that they were institutions.

Hay's
Trustees v.
Baillie.

At advising on 18th July 1908,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The question we have to consider under this reclaiming note relates to the validity and effect of Mrs Hay's residuary bequest, under which her trustees are directed to apportion and pay over the free residue "to or amongst such societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable Grimond's Trustees, 6 F. 285 and 7 F. (H. L.) 90, where the expression was 'charitable or religious.'

"Grimond's case is, I think, of special importance, as the last pronouncement of the House of Lords on the subject, and because the Lord Ordinary and the majority of the Inner-House were in different ways prepared to give that restricted meaning to 'religious' which would have made it, in their own opinion at least, as definite as 'charitable,' and which, had the judgment stood, would have justified such a restriction of 'benevolent' as would have made it synonymous with 'charitable.' My own opinion is that 'benevolent' is a word of too wide meaning to be descriptive of a particular class of objects, and I find confirmation of this opinion in the English cases cited.

"(Third) Is there in Scotland such favour to charitable bequests that our Court will, to give effect to a testator's beneficent intention, read 'charitable' so wide as to be the equivalent of 'benevolent,' or so restrict 'benevolent' as to be the equivalent merely of 'charitable'?

"Much has been said of the difference of Scottish and English law in the use of the word 'charitable,' and it is maintained that in England the word has a narrow and technical, and in Scotland a wider and more liberal meaning. I admit that it has in England a technical meaning, but if not the same in result, I think it is wider rather than narrower than that which it has in Scotland.

"In contrasting the law of England and Scotland, I am unable to follow the reasoning of one of the learned Judges in Cobb's case, supra, where he says that 'nothing can illustrate more strongly the vital distinctions between the two systems than to contrast the English cases of Williams v. Kershaw, supra, and In re Jarman's Estate, supra, with the judgments of the House of Lords sitting as a Court of Appeal from Scotland in Hill v. Burns, supra, and Millar v. Black's Trustees, supra.' I have endeavoured to trace this contrast without success. The different results arrived at in these cases by the Courts of the two countries depend upon no distinction between their two systems of jurisprudence, but merely on the fact that the English Courts were dealing with terms actually or constructively distributive, and the Scottish Courts with terms actually conjunctive. But for this fact there would, I am satisfied, have been no difference in the judgments.

"In England the expression 'charitable' derives its meaning from the Act of Queen Elizabeth passed to provide a control over maladministration of charities. That Act has received from the Court a wide interpretative application, in the same manner as our triennial prescription Act has, and it covers charitable purposes of the eleemosynary character, educational purposes, religious purposes, and certain public purposes, such nature" as the trustees may approve, but to the exclusion of Roman Catholic institutions. July 18, 1908.

I desire to concur in the opinion which will be delivered by Lord Dundas, Hay's Trustees v.
Baillie.
in which the authorities bearing on this interesting question are fully considered, and shall only add a short statement of my view as to the principles Lord M'Laren.
which I think should be applied in the construction of bequests of this character. And first in order, though not in importance, I may say that in many cases relating to special and general legacies, to ademption and the interpretation of ambiguous words of bequest, this Court has been aided by the consideration of the decisions of the English Courts, where it appeared that the principles which governed these decisions were such as we should ourselves apply; and in this case counsel have very properly and usefully brought under our notice the English decisions which may throw light on the question before us. It is a principle common to the two systems of as supply of water to a locality, building of sea-dykes, &c., but subject to this condition—that each and all of these purposes must be public and not private in their purview, an excellent example of which is the case of Cocks, L. R., 12 Eq. 574 (585.) It is clear that some of these purposes would be benevolent, but hardly charitable in any ordinary sense, and I think that there can be no doubt that trustees in Scotland, with a discretionary power to apply funds to charitable purposes, would be restrained from applying them to some of them.

"In Scotland, on the other hand, there is no statutory foundation for the interpretation and no statutory jurisdiction conferred on the Court. But I think much has been borrowed from England. Apart from decision, it has often been stated from the bench that 'charitable' is indefinite in itself, and but for favour to charity would never have been accepted as descriptive of a sufficiently particular class of objects. But two leading decisions made it a vox signata in Scotland, and thenceforth determined that it must be accepted as sufficiently particular.

"In Hill v. Burns, 1826, 2 W. & S. 80, the main question at issue was whether a testator could invoke alienum arbitrium to any effect in the distribution of his estate. On a review of prior Scottish cases Lord Gifford deduced the conclusion that the law of Scotland was more liberal in the construction of charitable than of other bequests, and held that the above position had been accepted. He then sustained, without further reasoning, a bequest in favour of institutions for 'charitable and benevolent purposes' established or to be established in or near Glasgow.

"In Crichton's case, 1828, 3 W. & S. 329, Lord Lyndhurst, after laying down the proposition that to admit of discretion being conferred on trustees, the object of their discretion must be a particular class, decided that 'charitable' by itself must be accepted as sufficiently particular. And that has been the law of Scotland ever since. But in determining this he had no direct authority except Hill v. Burns, supra, and it is clear that he went a good deal beyond it, and I cannot help thinking was much influenced by his English Chancery experience.

"But although Crichton's case is the rule of Scottish law, it does not determine what the limits of 'charitable' are, and it does not follow from that decision that the favour for charity which has induced the Court to accept 'charitable' as definitive of a sufficiently particular class of objects will further induce the Court to give to 'charitable' a loose and vague meaning, so as to cover anything which may be classed as benevolent.

"This subject has been matter of discussion in two later cases—in Baird's Trustees, 15 R. 685, and Pemsel's case, L. R., [1891] A. C. 531. In the former case in Scotland the opinion of the Court was, that 'charitable'

July 18, 1908. law that bequests for charitable purposes should receive an indulgent and favourable criticism with a view if possible of giving effect to the testator's benevolent intentions. In the development of this principle the rule against giving effect to bequests of a wholly undefined character has been relaxed

Hay's Trustees v. Baillie.
Lord M'Laren. in favour of charities. I note in passing that it appears from the reported cases that the Courts of England in considering whether a particular bequest falls within the description of charity have been guided by the statute of Elizabeth, and the judicial interpretation that has been put on the expressions "charitable" or "charity" as there defined. But the range of objects or purposes which have been considered to be charitable under the law of England is so wide that I think it may fairly be said that in the interpretation of bequests for charitable purposes the Courts of both countries may be taken as dealing with questions which are substantially the same.

The present case, however, does not raise any question as to the meaning of the word "charitable," because the direction is to apportion and pay the residue of the testator's estate "to or amongst such societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable nature in such proportions" as the trustees in their discretion shall think proper. Now, it is settled by a series of decisions of the highest authority that a bequest to charitable institutions or for charitable purposes to be administered by the testator's trustees is a valid bequest, and these decisions will govern the present case unless the gift to the institutions which are there described is invalidated by the association of the word "benevolent" with "charitable."

In the arguments which were addressed to us the question was discussed whether the determination of this question would be different in the case of a bequest to benevolent and charitable institutions, and in the case of a bequest to benevolent or charitable institutions. There are cases where the must in interpreting the sections of the Income-Tax Act, which gives relief to charitable institutions, have the meaning which they conceived it to have in the class of cases with which I am dealing, viz., the restricted sense of eleemosynary or material relief to physical necessity.

"In the latter case, where the same question under the income-tax had arisen in England, opinions were expressed that too narrow a view had been taken by the Scottish Court in Baird's Trustees, supra, and that, whatever the term 'charitable' might cover, if it required to be interpreted in applying a bequest such as that in the present case, the statutory meaning of the expression was much wider than they had assumed. Perhaps the most general definition of the view of the majority of the Court, for Lord Halsbury (Lord Chancellor) and Lord Bramwell dissented, was that given by Lord Herschell to the effect that charity included even in Scotland everything done in relief of human need, whether physical, educational, or religious.

"It has yet to be determined in a proper case of the application of such a bequest in Scotland, as distinguished from a case under the Income-Tax Acts, whether the view of the First Division in Baird's Trustees, or that of the majority of the House of Lords in Pemsel's case is the correct view. But in no event is there any ground for saying that 'charity' and 'charitable' in Scotland can receive a wider signification than it has received in England, or than Lord Herschell's attempted definition in Pemsel's case, and that is, I think, and on the authorities I have cited, very far short of 'benevolent.'

"For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that I must hold the bequest void from uncertainty."

use of "and" as contrasted with "or" may be important, but I do not think July 18, 1908.
that this is one of them.

If in the present case we substitute "and" for "or" it is clear enough, and indeed it was not disputed, that the bequest would be valid, because there could be no difficulty in finding institutions which were alike benevolent and charitable in their objects; and, being charitable, such institutions would have the benefit of the rule that a charitable bequest to be administered by trustees would not fail for want of further specification. But it is impossible to state this proposition without seeing that in such a case the real ground of decision is that "charitable" is the determining characteristic, and that the addition of the word "benevolent" neither enlarges nor restricts the scope of the bequest.

Hay's
Trustees v.
Baillie.

Lord M'Laren.

In contrast to the case here put I will suppose the case of a bequest for charitable and public objects. Now a bequest for charitable or public objects has been held to fall within the rule against indefinite bequests, because the trustees might apply part of the money to public objects which are undefined; and I have difficulty in admitting that the use of the word "and" would make the bequest any better, because there are two objects, the one undefined and the other in contemplation of law sufficiently defined, and the trustees in fair administration would be bound to allot something to each class. I should therefore deprecate the use of a canon of construction which would make the validity or invalidity of the bequest to depend on the casual use of the word "and" in place of "or," or the use of the word "or" in place of "and," without any evidence from the context that the testator attached importance to the use of the conjunctive or disjunctive particle.

I agree with Lord Dundas that the true question in the present case must be, did the testator mean two classes of objects, one of which was not charitable in its nature, or did he mean one class which he described indifferently by the adjectives benevolent and charitable? If this is the question, I think it admits of only one answer. "Institutions of a benevolent nature" is, as I think, just a periphrasis for "charitable institutions." It may be that in a somewhat strained interpretation of "benevolent" we might conceive of an institution to which the word benevolent would apply, and which would not fall within the limits of charitable gift. But then we call in aid the principle of the benignant construction of charitable bequests. A construction which calls in aid the almost impossible case of a class of benevolent institutions which are not charitable, amongst which the residue is to be partitioned, and that for the purpose of defeating the express testamentary intention, would not, in my judgment, be a benignant or even a reasonable construction. But, applying the true canon of construction applicable to bequests of this description, I come without difficulty to the conclusion that the testator meant to use "charitable" and "benevolent" as equivalent terms. On this construction the use of the word "or" is grammatically correct, because it implies that, whether you describe the objects of the bequest as "benevolent" or "charitable," the meaning is the same, and therefore the gift is not void in respect of uncertainty.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. We have, in all cases of July 18, 1908. the validity of a bequest, two questions to consider—in the first place, what is the rule of law by which we ought to be governed in determining the question of validity? and, secondly, what is the true meaning of the particular will which we have to construe? It is only with reference to the first of these questions that, in my opinion, we are bound, or greatly aided, by previous decisions. What the law is must be determined in accordance with the authorities by which we are bound. What the true meaning of a particular testator is we must ascertain for ourselves, by reading the language which he or she has used, and putting upon it its natural meaning, without any special reference to what previous judgments have held to be the meaning of other testators using different language.

Now, upon the first of these two questions, I think it is clearly settled in the first place that a testator cannot commit to trustees the power of making a will for him. He must make the will for himself, and therefore he must define sufficiently the persons or purposes which he intends to be the objects of his bounty, to enable the trustees to carry out the intention that he has expressed, instead of committing to a trustee an unlimited power to find out objects of bounty for himself. I take it to be settled, however, in the law of Scotland, that a bequest will be valid if a testator points out to his trustees a definite class of persons or objects to be favoured, although he leaves the trustee to select individuals within the class. It is probably a question of degree whether the circumscribing line by which he defines this class is sufficiently distinct or not, but, of course, I concur with what your Lordship has said, that we must take it as now settled that where a trustee is directed to select among charitable objects, there is sufficient definition to enable him to carry out the intention of the testator.

So far I think the law is clear, but then the question comes to be whether the objects of the bounty of this particular testator are sufficiently defined to enable a trustee of ordinary common sense and ordinary familiarity with the business of life to satisfy himself that he is selecting among the class pointed out to him by the testator. It is conceded that if this testatrix had directed her trustees to apportion her residue among societies and institutions of a charitable nature, such as they should think proper in their discretion, but excluding societies or institutions connected with the Roman Catholic Church, that would have been a good bequest, but then it is said to be an invalid bequest because in place of confining herself to the word "charitable," she has used the words "of a benevolent or charitable nature." The real question is, whether upon the construction of the will that is a wider class of purposes than the word "charitable," taken alone, would have defined. It appears to me that the question whether this testatrix really meant "You are to select between two distinct classes of institutions, charitable institutions on the one hand, and a different class of institutions altogether, which I call benevolent, on the other hand," is not a question upon which previous decisions can guide us at all. I think the question is—What did the testatrix really mean? and I do not think that is to be ascertained by a strict grammatical analysis of the words she has used. Taking the whole will—taking the particular direction for the distribution of the residue with reference to its context, the question is—What did this testatrix mean?—and I confess that I have no doubt that by "charitable or benevolent," she meant one thing, and not two things. The whole difficulty July 18, 1908. arises from what I think is a mere redundancy of expression, and we had cited to us several examples of a similar redundancy, in the expressions, ^{Hay's} Trustees v. not of testators, but of learned Judges who were discussing this kind of ^{Baillie.} question. I do not think that, in ordinary language, when a testator ^{Lord Kinnear.} describes institutions of a charitable or benevolent character, she means two different kinds of institutions, which she distinguishes from one another; and if not, I think that she has given a sufficiently definite description of the class of institutions which she intends to favour, to enable trustees of requisite common sense to carry out her intention.

I wish to add that I also, like Lord M'Laren, have had an opportunity of reading Lord Dundas's opinion, and I entirely concur in the view which he has expressed.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion, but I should like to add some words of my own, because the case is an interesting one, and because we are differing from an elaborately expressed opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The decision of the case must really depend on the intention of the testatrix—to be ascertained from the language she has used; and the Court will incline, if possible, to support the will rather than to set it aside as void by reason of uncertainty. Now, I think, as matter of ordinary construction, the words "benevolent or charitable" should be read, not as referring to two distinct and alternative classes of "societies or institutions," but rather as expressing, in an amplified and perhaps redundant fashion, the "nature" or quality which the societies or institutions must possess in order to come within the scope of the delegated bounty of the testatrix. Of the words "benevolent" and "charitable," the former is perhaps the more comprehensive, but they are closely cognate, and obviously have much in common. I observe that Dr Johnson, in his Dictionary (1755, folio ed.), defines "benevolent" as "kind, having goodwill or kind inclinations"; and "charitable" as "(1) kind in giving alms, liberal to the poor; (2) kind in judging of others; disposed to tenderness—benevolent." In Pemsel's case,¹ Lord Watson (at p. 558) and Lord Herschell (at p. 572) seem to define "charitable" as being practically synonymous with "benevolent." At all events, I think the two words are not, in the will under consideration, used as alternatives, but may fairly be read exigetically, as if the testatrix had said "of a benevolent—by which I mean of a charitable—nature." I am unable to figure any kind of institution which should be of a charitable but not of a benevolent nature; nor—though the aid of the Bar was invoked at the discussion—was any satisfactory example of the converse proposition forthcoming. If the construction suggested is correct, the present case is at once differentiated from cases like *Blair*² and Grimond,³ where the word "charitable" was used as an alternative to "public" and to "religious" respectively; and the will was in each case held to be void from uncertainty, because the second adjective was of so vague and indeterminate a character as to be incapable of execution. With these cases one may contrast Miller

July 18, 1908. v. Black's Trustees,¹ where the words were "benevolent and charitable purposes"; and Lord Brougham, in holding the gift valid, observed—
 Hay's Trustees v. Baillie. "Suppose we read 'and' 'or,' the authorities in the Scottish law do not entitle us to hold that this is so uncertain as to be void"; and the opinions Lord Dundas. of the learned Judges—especially that of Lord Trayner—in Cobb's Trustees,² where a bequest "to such useful, benevolent, and charitable institutions" as the trustees in their discretion might think proper, was sustained. The present case seems to me to fall well within the lines desiderated by the Lord Chancellor in the recent case of Murdoch's Trustees.³ There the residue was directed to be employed in the relief of persons who, with other qualifications, had "shewn practical sympathy in the pursuits of science." The validity of the bequest was sustained. Lord Loreburn, after emphasising the rule that a benignant construction will be placed upon charitable bequests, said—"All that can be required is that the description of the class to be benefited shall be sufficiently certain to enable men of common sense to carry out the expressed wishes of the testator." I do not think men of common sense would have difficulty in apportioning Mrs Hay's residue among societies or institutions of the class described by her, if the construction of her language which I have indicated is the natural and proper one.

I should be prepared to rest my decision upon the simple grounds now stated. But the Lord Ordinary has reached an opposite conclusion. His Lordship's opinion has been largely influenced by a consideration of certain English cases to which he refers. It seems, therefore, proper to make some general observations in regard to these cases. Most, if not all of them, have been cited in argument in the recent decisions in Scotland—e.g., *Cobb's Trustees*² and Grimond.⁴ For my part I think a real danger may arise when this branch of the law is being considered, if Judges in Scotland follow English decisions implicitly and without careful scrutiny, or Judges in England so accept Scots cases. I am not sure that there is any real difference in principle between Scots and English cases on this question, because under both systems of law the rule against giving effect to an otherwise indefinite bequest is only relaxed in favour of "charitable" bequests. But, as observed by Lord Davey in Blair's case,⁵ "there is no doubt that the English law has attached a wide and somewhat artificial meaning to the words 'charity' and 'charitable,' derived, it is said, from the enumeration of objects in the well-known Act of Elizabeth, but probably accepted by lawyers before that statute. In the law of Scotland there is no such technical meaning attached to the words." I gather that the English Courts are in use to construe such words as, e.g., "benevolent" or "philanthropic"—occurring in a will in juxtaposition with "charitable"—in the light and by the standard of the peculiar meaning which the latter word has acquired in England. I think it is the case that the existence of the distinction pointed out by Lord Davey has resulted in decisions being pronounced by the English Courts which are not in harmony with the law of Scotland. A striking example is found by comparing the English case of *White*⁶ with the

Scots case of Grimond.¹ The two cases cannot stand together. Yet July 18, 1908. *Grimond*¹ is undoubtedly Scots law, as I presume *White*² to be good law Hay's in England. This is dealt with by Lord Moncreiff,³ whose opinion, differ- Trustees v. Baillie. ing from the other Judges of the Second Division, was expressly approved Lord Dundas. by the House of Lords. I prefer, for my own part, to determine the question raised in this case upon a construction of the language used by the testatrix, with such light as can be obtained from decisions in Scots cases, which in this branch of the law afford, to my mind, safer confirmation of one's opinion than those pronounced by English Courts, unless it is clear that the latter were not influenced by the special meaning attached in England to the word "charitable."

For the reasons stated, I am of opinion with your Lordships that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled, and the first branch of the claim for the trustees and executors of Mrs Hay sustained. It may be proper to observe that, since that interlocutor was pronounced, three important cases have been decided upon this branch of the law—two of them by the House of Lords—viz., Murdoch's Trustees,⁴ Allan's Executor,⁵ and Dick's Trustees.⁶

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; repelled the claims for the next of kin; sustained the claim for the trustees, and preferred them to the whole fund in medio.

Wedderburn.

Jurisdiction—Heritable Office—Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland—Nature of Office.—Held that the Court of Session had jurisdiction to determine claims to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland, that office being a heritable office and not a mere title of honour, and the right to the office being a right of property which was within the cognisance of the Court.

Opinion, per curiam, that the office was transferable by disposition, and subject to diligence.

Res Judicata—Right to heritable office—Determination of Court of Claims as to right to perform services of office at Coronation.—In 1901 the King, by commission under the Great Seal, appointed a body of commissioners "to receive, hear, and determine" the claims of persons claiming the right to perform services at the time of the Coronation. Claims to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland were put forward by the Earl of Lauderdale, by Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, and by another person. The Court of Claims pronounced this deliverance:—"The Court considers that the right to the office . . . is vested in the family of Scrymgeour, and that the petitioner, Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, has established a

The other claims were disallowed. Subsequently an action was raised in the Court of Session at the instance of the Earl of Lauderdale for declarator that he was entitled to the office. The action was defended by Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, who pleaded, inter alia, "res judicata" in respect of the decision of the Court of Claims.

Earl of Lauderdale v.
Wedderburn.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the Court of Claims did not decide the legal right to the office in perpetuity, but only determined the person who was prima facie entitled to officiate at the Coronation, and plea of res judicata repelled.

Title to Defend—Heritable Office—Title to dispute claim to office.—The Earl of Lauderdale raised an action for declarator that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland. He averred that by the Act 1600, cap. 44, the office was confirmed to "Sir James Scrymgeour and his heirs-male," and that the pursuer's predecessors had subsequently acquired right to the office. He called as defender Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, who denied the pursuer's right to the office, and, in support of his title to defend the action, averred that he was "heir-male of the Sir James Scrymgeour mentioned in the Act of 1600."

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the defender had averred a sufficient title to defend the action and to dispute the pursuer's claim, and that it was not necessary for him ante omnia to prove by service that he was the person entitled to the office in the event of the pursuer's claim proving invalid.

Process—Decree—Prescription—Negative Prescription—Decree in Absence—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 24.—In 1671 Charles Maitland of Hatton raised an action in the Court of Session concluding for declarator, inter alia, that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland, and called John Scrymgeour as a defender. John Scrymgeour appeared, and, after stating certain defences, was allowed to withdraw from the action, and in his absence decree was pronounced in favour of the pursuer as concluded for.

In 1902 an action was raised in the Court of Session at the instance of the Earl of Lauderdale also concluding for declarator that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer. The pursuer claimed as in right of his ancestor, Charles Maitland, and founded, inter alia, on the decree of 1671. The action was defended by Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, a descendant of John Scrymgeour.

Held that in respect of the operation of the negative prescription and of sec. 24 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, the decree of 1671 could not now be impugned, and that the pursuer, as in right of the decree, was entitled to the office.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

(SEE 7 F. 1045.)

On 28th April 1902 an action was raised at the instance of Frederick Henry, Earl of Lauderdale, against Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, Esq., of Wedderburn, and the Rev. Ronald Cameron Scrymgeour. The action concluded for declarator "that the pursuer has the only good and undoubted right to All and Whole the hereditary office of our standard or banner bearer or office of carrying all our ensigns or standards, coronets, pensils, and other ensigns of war and battle, of whatever shape, fashion, or colour, as well of foot as of horse, which are or have been in use to be displayed before us or our royal predecessors, or which may be displayed in future before us or our successors, with all honours, dignities, lands, fees, duties, customs, and immunities whatsoever belonging and pertaining to the said office."

There were also conclusions for declarator that the defenders had no right to the office of Standard Bearer, and for interdict against the defender H. S. Wedderburn claiming to discharge the same.

Earl of Lauderdale v.
Wedderburn.

The defender H. S. Wedderburn entered appearance to defend the action. No appearance was made for the other defender.

The averments of parties were as follows:—

(Cond. 1) "By an Act of the Scots Parliament passed in the year 1600 (Act 1600, cap. 44) there were confirmed the infestments, rights, titles, and securities made to Sir James Scrymgeour of Dudhope, Knight, and his predecessors, by the King and his predecessors, of the heritable office of bearing the King's banner, which office it is believed had been enjoyed by him and his predecessors for some considerable time previously. The said Act, inter alia, declares that the said Sir James Scrymgeour and his heirs-male 'had and hes the onlie and indoubtit heretable richt of the said office and of the beiring of all his hienes banneris standertis cornettis pinsailles handschenzies vtheris signis and tokinnis of battell and weir of quhatsumeir collar schaip or fassoun baith on hors and fute that hes bene displayit or sal happin to be displayit befor his hienes and his successouris at any tyme heireftir,' and also that with the advice of Parliament the King has of new given, granted, and disposed to the said Sir James Scrymgeour, and his said heirs-male bearing the surname and arms of Scrymgeour, the foresaid office, with all honours, lands, fees, duties, privileges, and immunities belonging thereto, and expressly annuls and discharges all infestments, rights, titles, and securities of the said office or any part thereof purchased by any other person without the consent of the said Sir James and his foresaids." (Ans. 1) "The Act here partially quoted is referred to for its own terms. The said Act recognised and confirmed, but did not create the right of Scrymgeour to the office and others. It is believed and averred that the office arose through an act of bravery on the part of one of the family, Sir Alexander Carron, in the time either of Malcolm III. (1057-1093) or of Alexander I. (1106-1124), historians differing as to the exact date, in return for which the King granted him the hereditary office of Standard Bearer, gave him a portion of the Royal Arms for his bearing, with the word 'dissipate' for motto, and changed the name of the family from Carron to Scrymgeour, which means 'good fighter.' Latér, by charter, dated 29th March 1298, William Wallace, as 'custos regni Scotiae,' granted to Alexander Scrymgeour certain land in Dundee and the Constabulary of Dundee, in return for his past services as Standard Bearer, pro fidei servitio et succursu suo praedicto regno impenso portando vexillum regium in exercitu Scotiae. Again, in a Great Seal charter, dated 2d September 1458, to the burgh of Dundee, James Scrymgeour is named as Vexillator domini nostri regis. There are numerous other evidences that the office of Standard Bearer, the original gift of which was antecedent to and separate from any grant of lands, had been hereditary in the defender's family for centuries before the date of the Act 1600, cap. 44."

(Cond. 2) "In 1661 the heir-male and successor of the said Sir James Scrymgeour in his estates and in the said office was John Scrymgeour, third Viscount of Dudhope, who was in that year created Earl of Dundee. The said John, Earl of Dundee, fell into financial difficulties. He sold considerable portions of the estates and contracted debt to a large amount, with the result that apprisings which affected the said office as well as the landed estates were led by July 18, 1908. of the said Charles Maitland in a process in which decree was pronounced by the Lords of Council and Session on 14th February 1671, it was not in the character of heir-male of the said Earl of Dundee, but on the ground that he was heir of provision under a tailzie dated in 1587, a plea which was repelled by said decree. The said decree further found that the Earl of Dundee had died without heirs-male capable of taking up his succession, and sustained the validity of the gift of ultimus hæres which was in dispute. The said John Scrymgeour was not, and the defender is not, the heir-male of the said John Scrymgeour, Earl of Dundee, or of the said Sir James Scrymgeour of Dudhope, to whom, and to whose heirs-male the said office was granted by the said Act of 1600, cap. 44." (Ans. 6) "The decree of 14th February 1671 and the proceedings which preceded it are referred to for their terms. Explained that the decree was pronounced in absence of Scrymgeour of Kirkton. Quoad ultra denied. The alleged title granted to the said Charles Maitland, by the King as ultimus hæres of the Earl of Dundee, was obtained upon false representations, as explained in Ans. 3. On or about 29th November 1670, Charles Maitland obtained upon similar representations a charter under the Great Seal in favour of him, his heirs and assignees, bearing to convey to him and them the Barony of Dudhope, and also, inter alia, the office of standard bearer, on the narrative that the subjects conveyed formerly belonged to John, Earl of Dundee, and then belonged to the King, and had come into his hands and into his gift and disposition by reason of recognition. This alleged title was absolutely inconsistent with and repugnant to the title alleged as coming from the Crown as ultimus hæres. Charles Maitland subsequently disclaimed the latter title. . . ."

(Cond. 7) "Relying apparently on the lapse of time and the probable loss of evidence adverse to his pretensions, the grandfather of the defender, Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, put forward a claim to assist at the Coronation of King George IV. as Royal Standard Bearer for Scotland, to which office he alleged he had right as heir-male of the Scrymgeours of Dudhope. In this claim he was unsuccessful, but from time to time it has been put forward in various ways by himself, by his son, the father of the present defender the said Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, and by the said defender himself, to the prejudice and annoyance of the pursuer's predecessors and now of the pursuer himself." (Ans. 7) "Admitted that the defender's grandfather claimed in 1820 to assist at the Coronation of King George IV. as Royal Standard Bearer for Scotland. Explained that the then Earl of Lauderdale presented at the same time a similar claim, and that both these claims were postponed. In 1876 the defender himself was summoned by Queen Victoria to attend as Royal Standard Bearer on the occasion of the unveiling of the Prince Albert Memorial in Edinburgh, and he did so attend. Quoad ultra denied."

(Cond. 8) "In particular the defender the said Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn recently presented a petition to 'The Right Honourable the Lords of His Majesty's Privy Council and the Executive Committee of the Court of Claims,' alleging himself to be Hereditary Royal Standard Bearer for Scotland, and praying for permission to attend the approaching Coronation of His Majesty, and to carry the Royal Standard in that capacity. A similar petition was presented to the same body by the other defender the said Reverend Ronald Cameron Scrymgeour."

(Cond. 9) "The said Court or Committee of Claims is a body of July 18, 1868. Commissioners who were appointed by the King by commission under the Great Seal, dated 26th June 1901, to receive, hear, and determine petitions and claims concerning services to be done or performed at or in connection with His Majesty's Coronation.* And to it accordingly was referred a petition from the pursuer to the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council craving permission to perform the duties and services of his said office of Hereditary Standard Bearer at the Coronation." (Ans. 9) "The pursuer's petition and the Commission under the Great Seal are referred to for their terms, beyond which no admission is made. Explained that the said Court of Claims was the Court specially constituted by His Majesty for the determination of, inter alia, the question of right to the office in question. . . ."

(Cond. 10) " . . . The said Court of Claims, on 15th January 1902, granted the petition of the defender the said Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, and refused the petition of the pursuer and that of the other defender the said Reverend Ronald Cameron Scrymgeour."†

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, in respect of his title to the said office as condescended on. (2) In respect that the defender is not the heir-male of Sir James Scrymgeour mentioned in the Act 1600, cap. 44, he has no title or interest to resist the conclusions of the summons. (3) Separatim, in respect of the decree of 14th February 1671 condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to declarator and interdict with expenses against the defender the said Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) Res judicata. (3) No jurisdiction. The right to the office in question has been decided by the Court of Claims, which was appointed by the King for the special and exclusive determination of this among other matters. (4) No title to sue. (7) The decree of 14th February 1671 and the gift upon which it bore to proceed are inept and of no effect, and have been held to be so by the Court of Session;¹ et separatim, the said decree and gift did not, and could not, validly include or deal with the office in question. (8) The office in dispute having been conferred upon the defender's ancestor and his heirs-male as a personal dignity to be held by him and them jure sanguinis, and having been publicly confirmed by the Act 1600, cap. 44, could not be lost or affected by apprising nor by recognition, but only by failure or corruption of blood, or by an Act of Parliament repealing the said Act.

On 28th November 1902 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) heard parties in the Procedure-roll. All the deeds and the decree referred to and founded on by the parties in their pleadings were before his Lordship at the discussion.

On 13th December 1902 the Lord Ordinary repelled the first three pleas for the defender.‡

Majesty with respect to urgent matters, viz.—the disposal, for the purposes of a particular State function, of claims to perform services at that function.

"It is not, of course, presumable that a Court thus commissioned should profess to adjudicate—at all events, to adjudicate finally—upon legal rights. It remains to consider whether it in fact did so. I am of opinion that it is only on a strained construction of the terms of the deliverance that such a conclusion can be reached. The introductory paragraph goes, it may be suggested, somewhat beyond the operative adjudication. But nevertheless it is the operative adjudication with which we are here concerned. And what was 'adjudged' simply was that the defender, and not the pursuer, should perform at the Coronation the services claimed. And the provisional character of that adjudication is, I think, emphasised by this—that in the introductory paragraph, to which I have referred and on which the defender founds, his (the defender's) title to represent a family of Scrymgeour is 'considered' only to be established prima facie.

"For these reasons, I am of opinion that the deliverance or judgment of the Court of Claims does not upon its just construction determine the present question. And this makes it unnecessary to consider the larger and constitutional question as to the power of the Crown to supersede with respect to legal rights the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals. In my opinion, as I have said, no such question arises here. But I may recall, what is matter of history, that the power of the Crown to create, by virtue of its prerogative, 'cumulative jurisdictions' was the subject of much controversy in the years preceding 1688, and that if it is desired to pursue the history of that controversy reference may be made to (1) the Scots Act, 1681, cap. 18; (2) the Articles of Grievances, 13th April 1689, Scots Acts, vol. 3, p. 172; and (3) Scots Act, 1690, cap. 28.

"I propose, for these reasons, to repel the two pleas in question; to appoint the debate to be resumed on the merits; and to grant, if that is desired, leave to reclaim."

* "OPINION.—In this case I some time ago heard, by desire of parties, an argument, and pronounced judgment upon two pleas stated for the defender—(1) no jurisdiction, and (2) res judicata. The other day I heard a second argument which, by desire of parties, was confined to two other points, viz.—(1) the defender's title to contest the pursuer's declarator, and (2) the relevancy of the pursuer's case.

"With regard to relevancy, I should be very unwilling, in a case depending mainly upon the construction of titles and documents, to pronounce any judgment on relevancy; or to form or express any opinion touching the merits of what may turn out to be a competition of heritable titles. It would, I think, be most undesirable to do so until the case has been put in the position of a concluded cause, by an allowance of proof and a full production of documents, either admitted or proved. It is only, therefore, as affecting the question of the defender's title to contest, that I propose even to touch upon the sufficiency of the pursuer's averments—that is to say, his averments read in connection with the titles to which he refers.

"But the question of the defender's title does come up, I think, quite properly at this stage. For on the record it stands in such a position that I think the pursuer is well justified in asking that he shall not be required to enter upon a competition of titles with the defender unless it appears either (1) that the defender has a good prima facie title on which to compete; or (2) that the defender, having no such title, he (the pursuer) is himself in the same position.

"Now it is, I think, impossible to say that the pursuer is in the position of having no title, or no title prima facie good. The title which he sets forth may perhaps be liable to be reduced upon some ground. I do not know. Perhaps even ex facie it may be in some particulars open to criticism from the point of view of the feudal formalist. That may or may not be so. But substantially I do not, I confess, see that prima facie there is anything wrong with it. The pursuer is infeft in this heritable office. He and his authors have been so under a series of connected infeftments for more than two centuries. They have held it for that period under charters flowing from the Crown, which charters, unless the Crown was non dominus, cannot be impeached by third parties. And with respect to any infirmity in the Crown's title, the only suggestion, so far as I could make out, was this—that this heritable office being limited to heirs-male of the Earl of Dundee, it was, for some reason, incapable of reverting to the Crown, either by way of succession or by way of return; and was so even if, as set forth in the title, no heir-male, or other heir having right, came forward on the death of the Earl of Dundee, to claim it.

On 3d December 1903 the defender lodged a minute in which he stated that he did not desire a further opportunity of establishing by the appropriate service his averment that he was the heir-male of John, Earl of Dundee, who died in 1668. Earl of Lauderdale v. Wedderburn.

On 4th December 1903 the Lord Ordinary, in respect of this minute, sustained the second plea in law for the pursuer, and decerned against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

“Now I confess that taking the view of the legal character of the office, which I expressed in my former interlocutor, I am not prepared, certainly at this stage and as at present advised, to make any assumption of that kind. On the contrary, I think that, at least prima facie, the Crown's title is good, and that the pursuer's title, as flowing from the Crown, is in the same position.

“Now, that being so, what is the defender's title on which he claims right to impeach (either by way of reduction or ope exceptionis) the Crown's grant on which the pursuer founds? He alleges, in general terms, that he is the heir-male of the Earl of Dundee—that is to say, the Earl who died in 1668, and on whose death the barony of Dundee, including the office in question, was assumed to revert to the Crown. But he produces no service. He condescends on no pedigree. As I understand it, he claims, upon the bare averment that he possesses the character of heir-male, to enter upon a competition of titles with the pursuer—a competition involving a protracted and costly proof. That is really the defender's contention.

“Now, giving the fullest effect to the circumstance that the defender is called to the action and does not initiate it, I am quite unable to accept this contention. I do not consider that it would be either just or convenient that such a procedure should be allowed. But I am afraid I must also add that the defender's claim to be heir-male of the Earl of Dundee and of the family of Scrymgeour is, at least as set forth on record, in a somewhat unfavourable position. His allegation, it will be observed, is that he is heir-male of Scrymgeour of Kirkton, and as such, heir-male of the Earl of Dundee; and no doubt, if his statement had stopped there, it would have been at least possibly true; for, of course, the Scrymgeours of Kirkton might have become heirs-male of the family at a quite recent date. But the defender goes on to allege that the Scrymgeours of Kirkton became the senior line of the family *on the death of the said Earl—that is to say, that the then Scrymgeour of Kirkton was the heir-male of the Earl at his death in

* The defender subsequently altered this averment by amendment dated 29th November 1904. Vide supra, p. 1240, note 2.

July 18, 1908. Argued for the defender;—(1) The Court of Session had no jurisdiction to determine claims to dignities and offices of honour.¹ The office of Standard Bearer was a dignity, and not a heritable office.² Earl of Landerdale v. Wedderburn. *Cockburn v. Langton's Creditors*³ referred to an inferior office of commercial value. (2) The question was foreclosed by the deliverance of the Court of Claims. The pursuer had already chosen his Court and presented his claim before it, and he could not now be heard to dispute the decision at which that Court had arrived. (3) The defender had averred a good prima facie title to defend the action, which was all that was required at this stage. Having been called to the action, he was entitled to appear.⁴ It was enough for him to allege that he was within the destination in the Act of 1600, cap. 44.⁵

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The jurisdiction of the Court of Session originally extended over all civil matters, and had only been limited with regard to peerages, leaving its jurisdiction over other 1668. And yet, if anything is clear upon the documents already produced, Scrymgeour of Kirkton preferred no such claim in 1668, or even in 1671, when he was called and appeared in the action of declarator which was in that year brought by the pursuer's author. For it appears from the decree of 1671 (a decree which, I may say in passing, was pronounced by a Court of which Lord Stair was a member and had just been appointed President, and which, so far as I can see, is a decree worthy of all respect)—I say it appears from that decree that Scrymgeour of Kirkton, although called to and having appeared in the action, was neither called nor appeared as heir-male or even as heir-general, but was called, and at all events appeared, simply as the nominatim substitute in a certain tailzied destination dated in 1587, which rightly or wrongly was held by the Court to be displaced by a later title dated in 1617. It appears also from the same decree that when that fact was ascertained, the next step of the counsel who represented Scrymgeour of Kirkton and the other defenders (the sisters of the deceased and his heirs of line), was to put forward as the heir-male of the deceased a different person altogether. They put forward as heir-male a certain Alexander Scrymgeour, whose compearance was (I think not unreasonably at that stage) disallowed, because he was not, as it appeared, able even to condescend on his relationship. It is very difficult in these circumstances to see how the defender can now claim to be heir-male of the Earl of Dundee, on the ground that Scrymgeour of Kirkton was the heir-male of the Earl at his death.

"That, however, is perhaps a digression. The broad, and, I think, important fact is that the defender's title rests simply on a bare averment of his alleged propinquity; and it appears to me that that being so, the pursuer is entitled to demand that before further procedure the position of the defender should be cleared up.

"Now, there are two ways in which that might be done. There might be a proof allowed of the defender's averments, as contained in ans. 3; dignities untouched.¹ Accordingly the office of Standard Bearer was July 18, 1908. within the jurisdiction of the Court of Session even if it was merely an office of honour. But it was more, it was a heritable office and possessed the incidents of heritable property.² (2) The determination of the Court of Claims was not final, and not intended to be final; it decided who was to exercise the office at the Coronation, and having done that, its effect was spent.³ It did not decide the legal right to the office in perpetuity. (3) The defender had no title to resist the conclusions of the summons. Ante omnia it was necessary for him to prove by service his connection with the first Earl of Dundee—the last member of the Scrymgeour family who had an undoubted right to the office.⁴

At advising on 29th November 1904,—

LORD PRESIDENT (KINROSS).—We have now to consider three interlocutors pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, the first on 13th December 1902, the second on 1st July 1903, and the third on 4th December 1903.

By the first of these interlocutors his Lordship repelled the first, second, and third pleas in law for the comparing defender, these pleas being (1) that the action is incompetent; (2) res judicata; (3) no jurisdiction. I think the Lord Ordinary was right in repelling all these pleas, and as his Lordship has given at length his reasons, in which I agree, for following this course, I do not think it necessary to examine these pleas in detail. The first and third of them run very much into each other, and substantior I might sist process to enable the defender to obtain, if he can, in the appropriate Court a service as heir-male in general to the Earl of Dundee, who died in 1668. Of course each of these courses has its disadvantages. In a proof the function of criticism, which in a service would be performed by the proper persons (viz., the competing heirs-male, if there be any), would fall to be performed by the pursuer. On the other hand, in a service the pursuer could not appear; and it might not improbably happen that—there being no appearance for any competing heir-male—the defender might prevail by simply proving to the satisfaction of the Sheriff in Chancery his descent in the male line from some common ancestor of himself and the Earl. As between these alternatives I have accordingly had some difficulty. But, in result, I have come to the conclusion that the proper course is, before further answer, to allow the defender an opportunity of obtaining a service if he can. I think that is the proper and usual course. My impression is that the production of an appropriate service would supersede any proof—I mean on the question of propinquity. But it is not necessary to decide that point now. All I propose to do at present is, before further answer, to sist process until the first sederunt day in October to give the defender an opportunity of establishing by the appropriate service that he is, as he alleges, the heir-male of John, Earl of Dundee."

July 18, 1908. ally involve the proposition that the office of Standard Bearer was of such a character that it did not carry with it any rights or incidents cognisable by a civil Court. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that this is not, at all events upon the averments of the parties and the information before us, the true character of the office, and that a question relating to it, such as that which we have before us, may be competently entertained and considered by this Court.

Earl of Lauderdale v.
Wedderburn.
Ld. President
(Kinross).

The plea dealt with by the interlocutor of 13th December 1902, upon which we heard most argument, was "res judicata," the adjudication pleaded in bar of the action being the determination or report of the Court of Claims appointed by His Majesty the King to receive, hear, and determine petitions and claims to perform services at or in connection with the Coronation. The duty was not confided to the Court of Claims of determining finally questions such as those which are raised in the present action, and I am of opinion that the deliverance issued by that Court cannot be successfully pleaded in bar of such an action as the present. The Court of Claims necessarily proceeded upon the information before them, while in the present action allegations are made of matters which were not proved before the Court of Claims.

By the second interlocutor, that of 1st July 1903, the Lord Ordinary, before further answer, sisted process till the 1st day of October then next to give the defender an opportunity of establishing by the appropriate service his averment that he is the heir-male of John, Earl of Dundee, who died in 1668. This interlocutor appears to have proceeded upon the view that the defender could not establish his plea that he was heir-male of John, Earl of Dundee, in any other way than by service to him in that character. It appears to me, however, that for the purposes of the present action it may possibly be competent to prove otherwise than by service some at least of the material allegations which the defender makes, and that it would be unsafe to separate this question from the others arising in the case. There are a number of other allegations made by both parties on record, which may possibly prove to be material to the determination of the case, and I understand that the counsel on both sides decline to renounce probation. Under these circumstances, I think that our proper course would be to pronounce—and I propose that we should, with a view to preparing the cause for final adjustment, now pronounce—an interlocutor in the following or in similar terms:—"The Lords having heard parties, and considered the record, proceedings, and productions, adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 13th December 1902: Recall his Lordship's interlocutors of 1st July 1903 and 4th December 1903, and counsel for both parties having declined to renounce probation, allow the parties a proof of their respective averments, the said proof to be taken before Lord Adam on a date to be afterwards fixed by his Lordship: Meantime reserve all questions of expenses."

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. On the question of res judicata it seems to me that the decision of the Court of Claims has already received full effect, because that decision was only to the effect that Mr Scrymgeour Wedderburn was entitled to officiate as Standard Bearer at the July 18, 1908. King's Coronation. That ceremonial has passed, and the judgment has ^{Earl of} received full effect. The question here, therefore, is entirely as to which of ^{Lauderdale v.} the competing parties is entitled to the hereditary office in perpetuity. On ^{Wedderburn.} the question of further procedure, I agree with your Lordships that there ^{Lord M'Laren.} ought to be an order for proof, because the foundation of the title of each party rests on a question of fact which is not admitted by either, namely, his propinquity to the original grantee.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships in thinking the question is not ripe for decision on its merits, and cannot be disposed of on its merits without prejudice to the parties until we have the facts before us on which either party relies. We can have these facts only by the parties being allowed a proof, or by one or both renouncing probation, and therefore the only course will be to allow a proof.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords open up the record, and allow the same to be amended in terms of the minute for the defender and the answers for the pursuer respectively,* and said amendments being made, of new close the record; and having considered the reclaiming note for the defender against the interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy, dated 4th December 1903, and heard counsel for the parties, recall said interlocutor, as also the interlocutor of 1st July 1903: Adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 13th December 1902; and counsel for both parties having declined to renounce probation, allow the parties a proof of their respective averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation, said proof to proceed before Lord Adam on a date to be afterwards fixed."

Proof was led before Lord M'Laren (Lord Adam having resigned) on 14th July 1906 and 12th January 1907.

The evidence led was oral and documentary. The defender also produced a pedigree in which he traced his descent from Alexander Carron or Scrymgeour mentioned in Ans.1. The oral evidence consisted principally of the opinions of experts as to the defender's genealogy, and the documentary evidence, of a series of documents, from 1298 onwards, in which the office of Standard Bearer was dealt with or referred to. The import of the evidence, so far as bearing on the nature and quality of the office, and on the defender's pedigree, is sufficiently stated in the opinion of the Lord President. The proceedings in the action of declarator raised by Charles Maitland in 1671 are narrated in the opinion of the Lord President.

Parties were further heard before the First Division on 25th February 1908, and following days.

Argued for the defender;—The office of Standard Bearer was a high dignity, passing jure sanguinis,¹ and not an estate capable of being disposed or adjudged. It was confined to members of a special family, as appeared from the fact that when it was created it was associated with a new family name—Scrymgeour. In this respect it

July 18, 1908. resembled the office of Earl Marshal,¹ or Keeper of the Register of Sasines,² or High Constable,³ and not the office of Usher.⁴ In the early documents dealing with the office it was never mentioned in the dispositive or tenendas clauses, i.e., it was regarded purely as an honour.⁵ There was no indication of its passing by symbolic delivery, and it was only a burden on lands, which were held independent of it. Accordingly the office must remain in the Scrymgeour family until it was lost to them by failure or corruption of blood, or by the passing of an Act of Parliament repealing their right—none of which events had occurred. No fees or emoluments were attached to the office which could be subject to diligence.⁶ The word “infestment” in the Act of 1600 merely signified the grant of the office.⁷ The inclusion of the office in the barony titles in 1643 was a mistake, and could not alter its nature.⁸ Such being the nature of the office, the titles of the pursuer were plainly inept in so far as they purported to adjudge the office, or to convey it to persons who were not of the Scrymgeour family. Nor could they be regarded as conferring a new office, since after the Act 1455, cap. 44, it was not competent to create any new heritable office. The pursuer’s titles were further subject to the following criticisms:—(1) The Ultimus Hæres Charter of 1670 proceeded upon the representation, false in fact, that John, first Earl of Dundee, had no heirs-male. The Crown had thus no right to make the grant.⁹ It was true that it was ratified by Parliament,¹⁰ but salvo jure cujuslibet.¹¹ (2) The decree of 14th February 1671, together with the gift upon which it proceeded, was the subject of two decisions of the Court of Session, by both of which it was declared null and void.¹² The decree itself was ex facie untenable. (3) The Crown Charter of Recognition, 1670, contained no reference to the office, and, in any event, a title by recognition was inapplicable.¹³ (4) The Crown Charters of Adjudication, 1672 and 1676, were passed salvo jure cujuslibet.¹⁴ It was enough for the defender to shew that he was an heir-male of the Sir James Scrymgeour on whom the office was conferred in 1600. It was not necessary for him to shew that all other heirs-male were extinct.¹⁵ On the evidence the defender’s pedigree was sufficiently established.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer tabled an ex facie valid title to the office, namely, his title as the admitted heir-male of Charles Maitland of Hatton, to whom the office had passed. The defender, on the other hand, had totally failed to prove his pedigree, and could not even condescend on the date at which the Scrymgeours of Kirkton — from whom he derived his descent — became the senior branch of the family. The defender having thus no title to the office, he had no right to dispute the pursuer's claim.¹ The office of Standard Bearer was not a mere dignity, but a heritable office, such as the offices of High Admiral, Master of the Household, and Armour Bearer. It was not necessary for this that the office should carry any distinct patrimonial advantage.² At anyrate, whatever its nature was originally, it had, by the 17th century, become feudalised and capable of being attached by diligence.³ From 1643 onwards it was included in the Barony of Dundee, and a title was made up to it in the usual way. This was not a mistake, as alleged by the defender, but a customary mode of extending the barony.⁴ The Act of 1600 was a private Act, and could not affect the interests of third parties.⁵ The question between the parties thus resolved itself into a competition of heritable right, and in such a competition the pursuer had clearly established his claim. But the question was really decided in the pursuer's favour by the decree of 1671, under which the pursuer had possessed the lands and the office.⁶ All the objections now stated to the decree could have been stated in 1671, and so were excluded by the plea of "competent and omitted."⁷ By the operation of the negative prescription, the decree could not now be impugned,⁸ even though it was a decree in absence.⁹

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The case for judgment is both important and interesting. It deals with the right to an ancient and honourable office, that of the Standard Bearer to the King of Scotland. We have before us in the papers the results of a long and most painstaking archaeological inquiry, and we have had the assistance of a careful and able argument on both sides of the Bar.

The form in which the case presents itself is an action of declarator at the instance of the Earl of Lauderdale, in which he seeks to have it found

July 18, 1908. and declared that in virtue of his titles the said office of Standard Bearer belongs to him. He called as defenders Mr Scrymgeour Wedderburn, of Earl of Lauderdale v. Birkhill, and the Rev. R. C. Scrymgeour, being the two persons who had Wedderburn. appeared as rival claimants before the Court of Claims, shortly to be mentioned. Mr Scrymgeour Wedderburn alone defends; and alleging that he is in right of said office, seeks absolvitor from the conclusions of the summons. The case is before your Lordships not for the first time, though I personally on the former occasions did not share your Lordships' deliberations; and I think it is necessary first briefly to recapitulate the former history of the case.

It is common ground between the parties that the office of Standard Bearer, which had been for long in the family of Scrymgeour, was confirmed to Sir James Scrymgeour of Dudhope and his heirs-male by an Act of the Scots Parliament in 1600. It was undisputedly possessed and enjoyed by John Scrymgeour, third Viscount Dudhope and Earl of Dundee. This nobleman fell into debt, and various apprisings were led against his estate. In 1668 he died, admittedly without male issue of his body. Shortly thereafter Charles Maitland of Hatton, Lord Hatton, and afterwards Earl of Lauderdale, acquired, as alleged by the pursuer, the right to the Standard-Bearership. This he did by obtaining a grant of the same (it will be understood that I am still setting forth the allegations of the pursuer) from the Crown, who had succeeded as ultimus hæres in default of male heirs to the Earl of Dundee, and he was duly infeft on the charter issued in respect of the grant.

He also bought up some of the apprisings, and upon them obtained a Crown charter of adjudication. He further obtained some supplementary titles. All these infeftments were confirmed by Act of Parliament. After him, and till 1761, the right was held on personal titles only, but in that year the seventh Earl of Lauderdale made up title as heir of the third Earl, and obtained thereafter a Crown charter of adjudication containing the said office. Since then the Earls of Lauderdale have duly made up titles to the said office, and the present pursuer has the same in his infeftments. Further, it is matter of admission that the present pursuer is the heir-male of Charles Maitland, afterwards third Earl of Lauderdale. On this statement the pursuer says his title to the office is complete.

The defender replies that the whole proceedings of Charles Maitland as regards the Standard-Bearership were inept. He says that the right was incapable of being attached by diligence, and consequently did not fall under the apprisings, and that it did not fall to the Crown as ultimus hæres, because although the Earl of Dundee died without heirs-male of his body, he did not die without heirs-male, and he says that he is, if not the heir-male, at least an heir-male of the said Earl, and as such entitled to resist the unfounded claim of the pursuer.

In this state of allegation each party began by an attack on the title of the other. The defender first pled no jurisdiction, by which he meant that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction to declare the right to such an office, just as it has no jurisdiction to declare the right to a Peerage. Lord Kyllachy, as Lord Ordinary, on 13th December 1902 repelled that plea; and to that judgment your Lordships, on 29th November 1904, adhered.

The defender next pled res judicata. This plea was founded on the July 18, 1908. fact that the Court of Claims, appointed to deal with claims of persons ^{Earl of} to render services at the Coronation of his present Majesty, had, on 15th ^{Lauderdale v.} January 1902, in a competition between these two parties and the other ^{Wedderburn.} defender as to the right to be present at the Coronation as Hereditary ^{Ld. President.} Standard Bearer for Scotland, pronounced in favour of the present defender and against the pursuer. The Lord Ordinary of the same date, 13th December 1902, repelled this plea also, and to that also your Lordships adhered.

The pursuer then attacked the defender's title to defend. The Lord Ordinary, after hearing parties, sisted the cause in order that the defender might produce, if he could, a service as heir-male of the Earl of Dundee, who died in 1688. Upon the defender's refusing to do so, he, on 4th December 1903, sustained the second plea in law for the pursuer, which was to the effect that the defender, not alleging himself to be the heir-male of the Sir John Scrymgeour mentioned in the Act of 1600 (it is admitted that the Earl of Dundee was his heir-male), had no title or interest to oppose the conclusion of the summons, and decerned and declared in favour of the pursuer. On 29th November 1904 your Lordships recalled that interlocutor, and, parties having declined to renounce probation, ordered a proof. That proof, oral and documentary, with minutes of admissions, is now before your Lordships.

I mentioned already that up to this point I was not a party to your Lordships' deliberations. I think it therefore expedient that I should first explain what I understand to be the precise effect of your Lordships' interlocutor recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 4th December 1903. I do not hold that you thereby expressed dissent with all the views expressed by the Lord Ordinary in his note. What I do hold to have been determined was that it was not right to deny the defender a title to defend solely on the ground that he did not ante omnia assert and prove that he was the heir-male of the Earl of Dundee. He did assert and offer to prove that he was one of the heirs-male of Sir James Scrymgeour, i.e., within the destination of the Act of 1600; and if that was so, and if his further allegations as to the ineptitude of Charles Maitland's titles were made out, then your Lordships held that he would have shewn a sufficient title to prevent the present pursuer obtaining his decree, even though he himself might conceivably have to give way before the superior claims of another Scrymgeour who could shew that he was the heir-male of the Earl of Dundee. I accordingly approach the case from that standpoint, although as this case may go further I may perhaps be allowed to add that I respectfully agree with that judgment.

One other point ought to be mentioned in order to be put aside before I come to the merits of the case. Neither party is in a position to plead the positive prescription as determining the matter in his favour, because neither can shew undisturbed possession. The office of Standard Bearer is not such a thing as admits of a proof of possession except on stated occasions. But following the analogy of acts of presentation in the case of patronage, probably if either party had been able to shew that on successive occasions of coronations he and his ancestors had been summoned by July 18, 1908. the Sovereign to execute his office that would have been sufficient.

Admittedly neither can do so.

Earl of Lauderdale v. Wedderburn. Coming now to the merits of the case, one might either first consider the point whether the defender had failed to connect himself with the destination of 1600 at all—in which case he would be a mere third party, and not entitled to defend—or one might consider whether Charles Maitland's titles were truly inept to transmit to him the office upon the grounds pled by the defender, a resolution of which in the negative would at least drive the defender to prove that he was the heir-male of the Earl of Dundee. On both of these questions we had careful and sustained argument. In my view of the case, however, there is another consideration which makes it unnecessary to resolve either of these questions, and that depends upon a fact which I have not so far stated.

Ld. President. In 1671 Charles Maitland, having by this time obtained the charter of ultimus hæres of 11th July 1670, which included ex facie the office of Standard Bearer, raised an action of declarator in which he called as defenders a John Scrymgeour, undesignated, but called as apparent heir (not, be it observed, heir-male) to the deceased Earl of Dundee, and also, inter alios, John Scrymgeour of Kirkton, who was, according to the defender's genealogy, his ancestor. In this action he obtained decree, and the extract-decree we have before us. Like all extracts of that period it narrates not only the conclusions of the action and the decree proper, but also the whole proceedings in the action. Now, the conclusions set forth that the pursuer, Charles Maitland, being the holder of the charter of 11th July 1670, which is then narrated as including various lands, &c., and, inter alia, "the office of Bannerbearer," it ought and should be found and declared that the whole foresaid lands and others, particularly and generally also mentioned, do properly belong and pertain to the said Charles Maitland, and then, after detailing the various steps of procedure and the defences, answers, replies, and duplies, goes on to say that the Lords repelled the defence, and therefore found, decerned, and declared in manner above written.

Now, that is a decree which in terms actually declared this office to belong to Charles Maitland in a process to which Scrymgeour of Kirkton was called, and, in my opinion, that concludes the whole matter. If your Lordships' judgment in this case is sound that this Court has jurisdiction to determine to whom this office belongs, then that was equally true of the same Court in 1671. The pursuer as heir of Charles Maitland is in right of that decree. It seems to me, therefore, that the present defender can never prevail against the pursuer without reducing that decree, and that he cannot do because of the negative prescription. For the pursuer can plead the negative prescription against the defender, even although he cannot himself assert the positive—(See Dundonald v. Dykes,¹ and the well-known case of *Cubbison v. Hyslop*²).

The defender attempts to criticise the result at which the Court arrived by examining the arguments of parties as set forth in the pleadings of parties detailed in the extract. But none of these criticisms are of any avail, for at best they could only shew that the Court was wrong. It is quite true that the contention seems to have turned on whether the ruling July 18, 1908. deed of the lands was a tailzie of 1617 or an earlier tailzie of 1587. And the reason for that was that the tailzie of 1617 was limited to the heirs-male of Sir John Scrymgeour. We have got that deed here, and it is so. It is, perhaps, well to remind your Lordships, in case of misunderstanding, that the assignati quicunque in a deed of that date were assignees before infestment. If this were the ruling deed no one could prevail against the donatar of the Crown unless he could allege he was heir-male of Sir John. Whereas the deed of 1587, which we have also got, tailzied the lands to a much wider destination, one branch of which was a Scrymgeour of Kirkton, and his heirs, so that the Scrymgeour, defender in the process, could prevent it being said that the lands had fallen to the Crown as ultimus hæres. It is also the fact that if you look at the deed of 1617 you find that it does not include the Standard-Bearership. But all this does not make an objection of the kind known as intrinsic nullity. It would only go to shew that the judgment was wrong—(See Kinloch v. Bell,¹ and *Speir v. Willoughby de Eresby*²). It is possible to say that there ought to have been a distinction made, i.e., that the lands ought to have been declared as belonging to Charles Maitland, but not the Standard-Bearership. But if so Scrymgeour of Kirkton was there and ought to have said so. Everything now pled as to the peculiar nature of the right to the office could have been said then. The reason very probably was that at that time the parties thought much of the lands and but little of the office. But the bare fact remains that a declarator in plain terms of the right to the office is sought by Charles Maitland, and that decree of declarator is pronounced in the terms craved.

The fact that the procurators for Scrymgeour are allowed to withdraw and the decree is pronounced as a decree in absence is also of no avail to the defender. This, of course, is an intrinsic objection. But it was long ago settled that a decree in absence proceeding on a personal citation (and a fortiori in a case where appearance was entered) could not be reduced merely on the ground of being in absence, after the death of the defender—*Macdonald*³—and the Court of Session Act, 1868, by section 24, protects all such decrees after twenty years after their date.

This view, if sound, makes it unnecessary to decide either of the other two questions. But in view of the importance of the case it may be as well that I should say something about them.

With regard to the question of the quality of the office, I share the views expressed by Lord Kyllachy in the first page of his first opinion. Whatever may have been the quality of the office in the dim ages in which it was first created, I think it fell under the feudalising influence which was apt to treat all such things as heritable and feudal, and accordingly, confessedly from times far earlier than the death of the Earl of Dundee it finds its place in charters and infestments along with other landed property, and the successive holders make good their right by service. If that is so, then I think it became subject to disposition and to diligence, and could then be carried by the charter of recognition or by the charter of adjudication. The case of *Cockburn v. Langton's Creditors*⁴ is another example of such a process,

July 18, 1908. and I do not think that the different class of the services makes any difference in the law. After all, the Sovereign could, if he chose, save himself Earl of Lauderdale v. Wedderburn. by not summoning his Standard Bearer to him on any occasion.

Then as regards the pedigree, my view is that although the defender Ld. President. raises a sort of moral conviction that the Scrymgeours of Kirkton were a branch of the Scrymgeours who held the office, yet I agree I cannot say that I think he has produced proof to get over the gap which occurs when you come to David of Sonahard. And unless he can get over this gap, admittedly he must fail. And here again I think Lord Kyllachy's remarks on another aspect of the decree of 1671 are very weighty. They might have been got over by other proof. But such proof has not been, in my judgment, forthcoming.

The result on the whole case is that though one cannot help feeling that Charles Maitland in 1671 got either by accident or design an office to which it is difficult to see he was entitled, yet that having got a decree in his favour, and the office having thereafter been duly transmitted, the present pursuer is entitled to prevail.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR.—I had intended to express my own views in this case, but every point upon which I think it turns has been expounded in the opinion which your Lordship has just delivered. I am content, therefore, to say that both upon the general law of the case, and upon the particular facts, I entirely agree with all that has been said.

O'Brien v.
Star Line,
Limited.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Onus.—In an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the onus is on the claimant to prove that the accident arose out of and in the course of the workman's employment.

A fireman, whose duty it was to remain on board the ship where he was employed, went ashore without permission, and returned to the ship in the evening intoxicated. In the morning he was found fatally injured at the bottom of a hold. The only access to the hold was in a part of the vessel where the fireman had no right to be, through a door which was kept locked, but which had been broken open.

In a claim for compensation brought by dependants of the fireman, the above facts were proved. There was no evidence to shew how the door of the hold had been broken open, or how the fireman had got to the hold, or how the accident had happened.

Held that the claimants had failed to prove that the accident arose out of and in the course of the fireman's employment; and accordingly that they were not entitled to compensation.

IN an application under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906,* July 18, 1908. in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, at the instance of Mrs Mary Payne or O'Brien, widow of the deceased Stephen O'Brien, fireman, and Daisy Burge, her daughter, against The Star Line, Limited, for compensation in respect of the death of Stephen O'Brien, the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) refused the application, and at the request of the claimants stated a case.

O'Brien v. Star Line, Limited.
1st Division,
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The case stated that the following facts had been proved:—
“ 1. That Stephen O'Brien was a fireman on board respondents' steamship 'Star of Ireland,' which ship he joined at Barry on 16th August 1907, and it was his duty to remain on board said steamship, and subject himself at any time to the orders of the master and chief engineer of the said steamship. . . . 3. That in August 1907 said vessel was in Glasgow harbour. 4. That on Monday evening, 19th August, O'Brien went ashore without permission. 5. That he returned the worse of drink late in the evening. 6. That he went to his bunk in the fireman's fore-castle. 7. That about 5.30 on the morning of Tuesday, 20th August, he was found seriously injured lying at the bottom of No. 1 hold. 8. That the hatch of No. 1 hold was open during the night. 9. That this hatch is situated inside the fore-extension of the vessel, which is an enclosed and covered portion of the vessel on the main deck used for stowing cargo in, and the entrance to which is by a hatch on the upper deck, which was battened down on the night in question. There is an iron door communicating between the fore-extension and the fore-castle, and the hatch through which deceased fell is situated about two feet from the said door, and one foot to the left of the line of said door. 10. That this door had been locked and bolted at Barry, as is usual, by the first officer, preparatory to cargo being stowed there at Glasgow, but that it had been forced or broken open at some time and by some person or persons unknown. 11. That this door is at right angles to and distant a few feet from the door of the firemen's lavatory, and is on the same deck and directly opposite to the door of the firemen's fore-castle, which is eleven feet ten inches away. 12. That the doors of the fore-extension and of the lavatory are vastly different in construction, size, material, and position. 13. That the door of the lavatory was always open, and kept so by lashings. 14. That from the time of his return to the ship until he was found in the hold the deceased had no duties to perform in the service of the ship, and, in particular, had no duty which took him into the fore-extension, and had no right to be in that portion of the ship. 15. That the deceased Stephen O'Brien was taken to the Western Infirmary, Glasgow. 16. That on 23d August 1907, he died there in consequence of his injuries. 17. That apart from these findings there was no evidence led accounting for the deceased being found injured lying at the bottom of No. 1 hold.”

The Sheriff-substitute continued—“ On the facts proved as above, I found that there was no evidence that the death of the deceased Stephen O'Brien was the result of injury sustained by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and refused the application.”

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1), enacts:—“ If in any employment personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall . . . be liable to pay compensation.”

July 18, 1908. The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether on the facts found proved Stephen O'Brien's death was the result of injury sustained by accident; and, if so, whether such accident arose out of and in the course of his employment, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906?"

O'Brien v.
Star Line,
Limited.

The case was argued on 25th June 1908.

Argued for the appellants;—There was sufficient evidence of all the circumstances required to entitle the claimants to compensation. The injury was caused by an accident,¹ or at least, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, must be assumed to have been so caused.² This being so, the claimants were entitled to compensation, unless the respondents could shew cause—such as serious and wilful misconduct—why it should be withheld.³ Under the Act of 1906, serious and wilful misconduct had no place in the circumstances of this case.⁴ The accident arose in the course of the employment. Employment was not confined to the hours during which work was being done,⁵ and the deceased was in the course of his employment as soon as he came on board the ship on which he was employed. Lastly, the accident arose out of his employment, for it was one of the risks incidental to his employment that he might fall down the hold.⁶

Argued for the respondents;—The onus was on the claimants to shew that the injury arose in the circumstances described in section 1 (1) of the Act.⁷ This onus had not been discharged, for no explanation had been given of the way in which the accident occurred. Such evidence as there was indicated that the accident did not arise out of his employment; for it occurred at a place where the workman had no business to be.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire, as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in a claim arising out of the death of Stephen O'Brien. The arbitrator has found that there is no evidence that the death of O'Brien was the result of injury sustained by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The material facts as stated in the case are as follows—(After summarising the facts given above his Lordship proceeded)—Now, in a certain sense this may be described as an accident arising in the course of the employment, because O'Brien was bound by the terms of his employment to be on board ship at night, and if he had not been in the employment of the Star Line the accident could not have happened. But this consideration does not solve the question, because the employer is only July 18, 1908. liable to make compensation for an accident arising "out of" the employment, which I take to mean that there must be some causal relation between the employment and the accident. On the facts stated the accident is wholly unexplained. The difficulty of assigning a cause is increased by the finding of the Sheriff that O'Brien when he returned to the ship was the worse of drink. There is no question as to misconduct in the case, because that element is excluded by the statute of 1906 in the case of accidents resulting in death. But it was the misfortune of O'Brien that when he returned to the ship he was under the influence of drink, whether from his own serious fault or from some excusable cause is of no consequence in the present inquiry, and people in that condition sometimes do strange things, which in a legal sense may be regarded as their voluntary acts. It was suggested for the claimants that O'Brien having occasion to go to the lavatory missed his way and fell into the hold. If the iron door communicating with the hold had been left open this might be a probable explanation. But here it is found by the Sheriff that this door was locked and bolted by the mate or first officer of the ship, and there is no evidence that it was afterwards opened by some person other than O'Brien. The facts are then consistent with the supposition that the door in question was forced open by O'Brien himself, in which case it could not be affirmed that the accident had arisen out of the contract of employment. We do not know how the door was opened or how O'Brien fell into the hold. As to the cause of the accident the evidence is a complete blank, and therefore I am unable to say that it was in fact an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment.

The conditions of the question are nearly the same as we find in the English case of Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company v. Pomfret.¹ The workman, who was in the employment of the railway company, was travelling homewards, as he was entitled to do, in one of the company's carriages. He was found with his head crushed under a bridge and on the line, and there was no evidence as to how the man lost his life. The Court of Appeal was of opinion that, in the absence of evidence on this point, it could not be affirmed that the accident arose out of the employment, because it was possible that it might be the result of the voluntary act of the deceased in attempting to leave the carriage while the train was in motion. Lord Justice Stirling's illustration makes the ground of judgment very clear. Now, I am not overlooking the subsequent history of the case, which is, that the Court remitted to the arbitrator to take further evidence, and on a rehearing held that the party was entitled to compensation. That was only a decision on the facts of the particular case. In the present case I do not propose that we should direct a further inquiry by the Sheriff, because I am satisfied on his statement of the case that we are in possession of all the evidence of which the case admits. But then the case is just in the position in which the case of *Pomfret*¹ stood at the first hearing, and the opinions delivered at that hearing support the conclusion to which I have come, that it is not proved that this accident arose from a cause for which the respon-

O'Brien v.
Star Line,
Limited.

LORD KINNEAR.—The question as stated by the learned Sheriff is really a question of fact. I have no doubt that if the Sheriff arrives at a conclusion such as he states in the last sentence of his statement when he says, "I found there was no evidence that the death of the deceased Stephen O'Brien was the result of injuries sustained by accident in the course of his employment," and if he arrives at that conclusion upon the ground that there is no legal evidence which he is entitled to consider, the Court may review a decision of that kind. We may instruct him, as we might instruct a jury, that there is evidence from which they might draw an inference of fact. We cannot tell the Judge or the jury that there is evidence from which they ought to draw an inference of fact, but if it appeared to me on reading this case that the Sheriff had gone wrong by misdirecting himself as to the kind of evidence which he ought to consider, I should have thought that a proper question was raised for the decision of the Court. But it seems to me quite clear that the Sheriff's decision is really a decision on fact upon evidence which he has fully considered, and I am not prepared to interfere with his judgment on a mere question of fact.

Since we have heard the whole question argued, I quite agree with the conclusion at which the learned Sheriff arrived. It must be taken, I think, as settled, that in order to recover compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act the claimant must establish two things—first, that the accident arose in the course of the workman's employment; and secondly, that it arose out of the workman's employment—and that the onus of proving these facts lies upon the claimant. Now, all we know is that this man was sleeping on board the steamship on which he was fireman. In the course of his employment it was his duty to be on board at night in order to submit himself to the orders of the master and chief engineer, and so far, therefore, he was in the performance of his duty in being on board. But then it was found that "from the time of his return to the ship the deceased had no duties to perform in the service of the ship, and in particular he had no duty which took him into the fore-extension, and had no right to be in that portion of the ship." It rather seems to me that that finding, taken by itself, negatives the proposition which the appellant seeks to make out, namely, that the accident arose out of his employment. He had no duty to perform at all, but was entitled to be on board and bound to be on board in order that he might be available for any duty that he might be called upon to perform. Now, it may be that if it had been shewn that in these circumstances an accident had befallen him from merely blundering through one door instead of going through another in going to a part of the ship where he was entitled to be, a question might have arisen, but that is not the fact. The fact is that he was found lying in the hold, that he could not have got there without in the first place going into a part of the ship where he had no right to be, and in the second place he could not go into that part of the ship without opening a locked door. The door was forced or broken open at some time, by some person; the Sheriff says it is not ascertained how or by whom. But then all the facts are that this man was found to have been injured by going into a part of the ship where he had no right to be, and which could only have been reached by forcing a locked door. I am unable to see how that can be said to be an accident arising out of his employment. I am not disposed to speculate as to how the accident might have happened, or how the door might have come to be open, because it is for the claimant to prove how that happened, if he can shew that it happened in such a way as to bring the case within the scope of the Act, and he has failed to prove it. It is possible to imagine a variety of ways by which such a thing might occur, but there is no reason to suppose that it occurred in the performance of duty. I agree with what was said by your Lordship in the chair that we must take into account that the Sheriff finds that this man came aboard in a state of intoxication. How did an intoxicated man open or break through a locked door and tumble into a hold where he ought not to be? I agree with the Sheriff that upon the evidence we cannot say we know anything about that. It is not proved that he did these things in the course of the employment in which he was engaged.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, and dismissed the appeal.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Desertion—"Reasonable Cause"—Act 1573, cap. 55.—Circumstances in which held that a wife who had deserted her husband had no reasonable cause for non-adherence.

Question whether in an action of adherence a wife can successfully defend herself upon any other grounds than would be required in order to sustain an action at her instance for separation and aliment.

Mackenzie v. Muckenzie, May 16, 1895, 22 R. (H. L.) 32, commented on.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Desertion—Interruption—Action of separation at defender's instance—Act 1573, cap. 55.—A wife deserted her husband, and after having been in desertion for about a year raised an action of separation against him, in which she was unsuccessful. Thereafter she continued to refuse to live with him. In an action of divorce on the ground of desertion at the instance of the husband, raised four years after the date of desertion, the wife pleaded that the period during which the action of separation was being carried on should be deducted from the four years, as during that period she was not in "malicious and obstinate defection."

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Dundas) that in the circumstances of the case she was not entitled to the deduction claimed.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Desertion—Privy Admonition—Act 1573, cap. 55.—A husband whose wife had deserted him, and who had frequently expressed his desire that she should return, signed an agreement with her about a year and a half after the date of desertion with reference to the custody of the child of the marriage, in which he stated that "he adheres July 18, 1908. to his former requests to her to return to live with him, and desires that she should do so." He had no further communication with her, and about two years and a half later raised an action of divorce for desertion.

M'Ewan v.
M'Ewan.

Held, in view of the circumstances of the case, that this declaration was a standing offer to his wife to return and needed no repetition, and that the husband had not failed in his duty to give "privy admonitions for due adherence" in terms of the Act 1573, cap. 55.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Dundas.

ON 18th July 1906 Thomas M'Ewan, electrical engineer, Edinburgh, raised an action against his wife, Mrs Jessie Prentice Jones or M'Ewan, concluding for declarator that the defender had been "guilty of wilful and malicious non-adherence to, and desertion of, the pursuer for the space of four years," and for decree of divorce.

The parties were married at Edinburgh on 19th December 1900, and thereafter took up house together.

The pursuer averred that on 28th September 1901 it was arranged between the parties that, for domestic reasons, the defender should go to her father's house at Dalmeny for a short time, where she accordingly went.

On 4th November 1901 the pursuer received a letter from the defender's agents charging him with cruelty and asking him to consent to a voluntary separation. On 27th February 1902 a child was born to the defender at Dalmeny. On 4th March 1902 the pursuer's agent, after an investigation into the circumstances, wrote to the defender's agents denying the charge of cruelty, and intimating that the pursuer desired the defender to return to his house. On 7th March the defender's agents wrote stating that she would not agree to return to live with the pursuer.

(Cond. 4) " . . . Since the said 7th March 1902 the defender has adhered to the position taken up in the said letter of her agents, and has without any justification persistently refused to return to the pursuer's house and to resume cohabitation with the pursuer, and she has remained in desertion since said date."

(Cond. 7) " . . . The pursuer has repeatedly, through his agent, and also personally, intimated to the defender that he desired her to return to him and resume cohabitation. . . . During October and November 1902 the pursuer and defender had frequent meetings, and the defender expressed her willingness to return soon to live with her husband, and with her knowledge and approval a house was accordingly taken by the pursuer. Early in December, however, the defender refused to see the pursuer when he called for her, and when he wrote to her as to her returning to the house he had taken she did not reply."

(Cond. 8) "On 13th December 1902 an action of separation and aliment was raised by the defender in the present action against the present pursuer, and on 8th December 1903, after a long proof, the Lord Ordinary (Lord Low) assolized the present pursuer. Mrs M'Ewan thereafter reclaimed against Lord Low's interlocutor."

The pursuer further averred that on 9th and 11th January 1904 an agreement was signed between the parties and the defender's father, by which it was arranged that for a time the defender should have the custody of the child, and that she should withdraw her reclaiming note, which was done.

The agreement contained the following article:—"First. It is declared and agreed that Mr M'Ewan's handing over the child to Mrs M'Ewan, who at present is living apart from him, is not to be held as to any extent implying acquiescence on his part in her continuing to live apart from him; on the contrary, he adheres to his July 18, 1908. former requests to her to return to live with him, and desires that she should do so." The other articles were concerned with the arrangements for the custody of the child and for the withdrawal of the action. M'Ewan v.

M'Ewan.

In answer to the pursuer's statements the defender made specific averments of cruelty and ill-treatment on the part of the pursuer prior to 28th September 1901, which were not pressed in argument on the reclaiming note, and into the details of which it is unnecessary to enter.

In answer to cond. 7 the defender stated:—"The defender in October 1902 offered to resume cohabitation with the pursuer, but his conduct demonstrated, and was intended to demonstrate, to the defender that it was impossible for her to return to live with him. . . . He made it a condition of the defender returning to live with him that a nurse employed by him at his own hand should have sole charge and control of the child, and should not be interfered with by the defender. This nurse had been grossly insolent to the defender, as the pursuer was well aware. The defender told the pursuer that it would be impossible for her to return to him if this nurse was not dismissed. The pursuer, however, declined to dismiss the nurse. The pursuer also made it a condition of the defender returning to live with him that no member of the family should visit or come to the house, and that she should have no communication with them. The conditions so imposed by the pursuer, which were quite unjustifiable, and which the defender was entitled to decline to accept, satisfied the defender that the pursuer had no real desire to resume cohabitation with her, that he had lost all real affection for the defender, and that she had no security whatever in the event of her returning to live with the pursuer against a continuance on the pursuer's part of his former conduct, subjection to which in the defender's state of health would have been attended with grave risk to her life. In these circumstances the negotiations for renewed cohabitation proved abortive."

She further averred that since the action of separation the pursuer had never made any overtures whatever, either personally or by letter, to the defender. This was not disputed.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having wilfully and maliciously deserted the pursuer for upwards of four years, he is entitled to decree of divorce as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The defender not having been guilty of wilful and malicious non-adherence to and desertion of the pursuer should be assoilzied. (3) The pursuer not having been ready and willing during the period of the defender's alleged desertion to adhere to the defender as a husband, the defender should be assoilzied. (4) The defender having been, and being, justified in refusing to adhere to the pursuer, owing to his conduct as condescended on, the defender should be assoilzied.

Proof was led before the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) on 16th July 1907, and following days.

The evidence established the truth of the account given in the pursuer's averments of the negotiations between the parties subsequent to 28th September 1901. The negotiations between the parties in October and November 1902, as bearing on the question whether the defender was justified in refusing to live with the pursuer, are fully detailed in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

July 18, 1908. On 19th October 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced decree as craved.*

M'Ewan.

* "OPINION.—This is an action by a husband against his wife for divorce upon the ground of desertion. The parties were married on 19th December 1900; the defender left her husband's house on 28th September 1901; and they have never since lived together. The action was raised on 18th July 1906. It is thus an admitted fact that the parties have lived apart for more than four years prior to the action. The main question is whether or not the defender had reasonable cause for remaining away from her husband during that period. The case is one of the utmost importance to the parties; I have heard a long and exhaustive proof, and able arguments by counsel; some—though not, I think, all—of the points of fact and law involved present considerable difficulty. I have therefore studied the case with great care and anxiety. I have come to the conclusion that the pursuer is entitled to the decree which he seeks.

"When the case was in the Procedure-roll a question of law was raised as to which, on 20th March 1907, I reserved my opinion for reasons then expressed. On 13th December 1902 Mrs M'Ewan brought an action of separation and aliment against her husband, in which the Lord Ordinary (Low), on 8th December 1903, assoilzied the latter. A reclaiming note was presented, but the case went no further, in consequence of an agreement between the parties to which I shall have to refer later. The question as to which I reserved my opinion was whether or not a valid defence to this statutory action for divorce for desertion may be based upon grounds insufficient to afford the defender success in her action for separation and aliment. In the view which I hold of the present case, it is not necessary for me to decide that question, because I am of opinion, for reasons which I shall explain, that even if it be answered in the affirmative, the defender has not made out any sufficient case of 'reasonable cause' for absenting herself from her husband. But, as the question is interesting and important, and as this case may go further, it is right that I should state my opinion upon the legal point. No defence, in my judgment, will be good as an answer to a statutory action for divorce, like the present, or to an action of adherence at common law, which falls short of what would be sufficient to support an action of judicial separation by the absenting spouse against the other. This question was fully canvassed, though not decided, in the well-known case of Mackenzie, 1893, 20 R. 636, aff. 1895, 22 R. (H. L.) 32. In the Court of Session, a majority of the Judges seem to have thought that what is 'reasonable cause' within the meaning of the Act 1573, c. 55, is a jury question for the Judge or Judges in each case as it arises; and that such 'reasonable cause' may consist in something less than would be sufficient as a defence to an action of adherence. The latter view was, as I gather, distinctly negatived in the House of Lords, at all events by Lord Watson (22 R., at pp. 40, 41). But his Lordship seems (at p. 42) to have treated as an open question for future decision whether or not, in an action of adherence, a wife can successfully defend herself upon any other grounds than would be required in order to sustain an action at her instance for separation and aliment. I am content to express my entire concurrence in the opinion of Lord Rutherford Clark in Mackenzie's case, the reasoning of which appears to me to be irresistibly sound. That, like the present case, was an action by a husband against his wife for divorce for desertion under the Act 1573, c. 55. Lord Rutherford Clark said, inter alia,—'The defender has, I think, only one possible justification. She must shew that she was not bound to adhere, or in other words, that she had a good defence to an action of adherence. The Court must give decree of adherence unless a good defence is stated, and when a wife disobeys the decree she must be in wilful and malicious desertion, for she is refusing to perform what the Court has determined to be her obligation as a wife. A decree of adherence

The defender reclaimed.

July 18, 1908.

The case was argued on June 9, 10, 11, and 12, 1908.

M'Ewan.

Argued for the defender;—(1) Looking to the conduct of the pursuer in October and November 1902, the conditions which he imposed on the defender's return, and in particular, his refusal to dismiss the nurse, the defender had reasonable cause within the meaning of the Act 1573, cap. 55, for refusing to adhere. Less would suffice as an excuse for non-adherence than was required to support an action of separation on the ground of cruelty at the instance of the wife.¹ (2) In any event, the pursuer required to prove not only that the desertion was unjustifiable, but also that it was obstinately persisted in for four years prior to the raising of the action, i.e., from July 1902 to July 1906.² This could not be proved, for from that period there fell to be deducted the time—December 1902 to December 1903—when the defender was carrying on an action of separation is no longer necessary as a formality in order to a divorce. But there is no change in the law. . . . I know of no defence to an action of adherence save adultery and cruelty, though I think that the latter may be moral as well as physical.' There is not much authority upon the point. Lord Rutherford Clark refers to the weighty dictum of Lord President Inglis in Chalmers, 1868, 6 Macph. 547, and to the direct decision in A B v. C D 1853, 16 D. 111,—(the word 'resist' in Lord Rutherford Clark's quotation from the interlocutor in A B v. C D is a misprint for 'insist on'). To these one might add Fraser on the Personal and Domestic Relations (1846), p. 448 and p. 684. On the other hand, it must be noted that Lord Fraser in his later book (Husband and Wife, vol. 2, p. 873) seems to have altered his opinion; and that Lord Watson (22 R. (H. L.) p. 42), was 'unable . . . to regard the case of A B v. C D as an authority of weight.'"

(His Lordship then examined the evidence with regard to the averments of cruelty and ill-treatment on the part of the pursuer prior to 28th September 1901)—"If my views upon the evidence are, up to this point, correct, it follows, in my judgment, that the defender had not, when she left her husband's house, reasonable cause for permanently absenting herself from him contrary to his desire. The evidence, in my opinion, falls far short of anything which has been hitherto held in our law to amount to legal cruelty or sevitia. . . . If again (contrary to my opinion) something short of sevitia may do as a defence to an action like the present, it appears to me that what is here proved ought not to be held sufficient. In considering such questions it is right and proper to have regard to the condition and the health of the wife; but I think it would be a new and dangerous doctrine to affirm that a wife has reasonable cause for remaining apart from her husband against his expressed desire because of conduct on his part which at times annoys or pains her, or may even have a prejudicial effect on her health, where there is no violence, and where the conduct is neither habitual nor deliberate, and is not the sole or even the main cause of her ill-health or weakness.

"I now come to consider the events which have happened since 28th September 1901, and I do so in the light of what, according to my view, had occurred previously. On 4th November 1901 Messrs Drummond & Reid wrote to the pursuer the letter to which I have already referred,

July 18, 1908. against her husband. There was no suggestion that this action was raised otherwise than in good faith, and during its currency it was obviously impossible for the defender to be living with her husband. Accordingly, while the separation action was pending, the defender could not be said to be in malicious and obstinate desertion.¹ (3) After the date of the action of separation (December 1903), the pursuer had held no communication with the defender, and had taken no steps to shew that he desired her to return to him. The article in the agreement of January 1904, founded on by the pursuer, was not a sufficient discharge of the pursuer's duty to give "privy admonitions for due adherence," in terms of the Act 1573, cap. 55.² By that agreement he virtually consented that his wife should live apart from him.

M'Ewan v.
M'Ewan.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The evidence as to the pursuer's behaviour to his wife admittedly fell short of the degree of cruelty alleging 'a long and systematic course of cruelty carried on' by him towards his wife, and asking him to agree to a voluntary separation. The pursuer handed this letter to his agent, who replied to it on the 8th, stating that he was making inquiries into the matter. Mr Robson's inquiry was careful and methodical, and occupied a considerable time. On 4th March 1902 he replied to Drummond & Reid, denying absolutely the charges of cruelty, or that any ground for separation existed, and stating that the pursuer desired that, as soon as the defender was sufficiently recovered from her recent confinement, she should return to her home, along with the child. On 7th March Messrs Drummond & Reid wrote that 'Mrs M'Ewan remains of the same mind as when she instructed us to write the letter of 4th November last to Mr M'Ewan, and . . . cannot agree to the proposal you make that she should return to live with Mr M'Ewan.' This is a very clear declinature to adhere, and the pursuer dates the commencement of his wife's desertion of him from this time, though he pleads alternatively a day in July 1902. I do not think that the effect of the letter in this aspect is materially diminished by the fact that Mrs M'Ewan was admittedly too weak and ill on 7th March to have been able to rejoin her husband. That was not the 'proposal' which had been made—in which her return was made expressly conditional upon her being sufficiently recovered to allow of her being removed with safety; and Messrs Drummond & Reid's rejection of the 'proposal' is absolute, and not based upon the state of her health at the time. The child, it appears, was born at Dalmeny on 27th February 1902. The first intimation of this event was made to the pursuer verbally through the law-agents upon the day after its occurrence—coupled with the strange request (repeated in writing, by Mr Robson's desire, on 3d March) that he should make immediate arrangements for taking over its custody. This, we now know, was entirely Mr Jones' doing. He is explicit about this. '(Q.) Did you want to prevent any reconciliation between the husband and wife, and in order to prevent that reconciliation did you send away the child? (A.) That is the idea we had at the time. The sending away of the child was entirely my act.' It is curious, however, to note that this is not consistent with the averments made in a petition presented to the Court in Mrs M'Ewan's name on 7th May for access to her child, the instructions for which Mr Jones says that he gave. On 21st June an important letter was written by the pursuer's agent to Messrs Drummond & Reid, in which which would entitle her to a decree of separation. It was accordingly insufficient to justify her non-adherence.¹ This point had never been directly decided one way or another, but on principle it would be anomalous to hold that a wife was not entitled to live separate, and yet was not bound to adhere. Even if a less degree of cruelty were sufficient, the evidence did not establish that it had occurred. (2) The period of the separation action should not be deducted. The running of a prescriptive period was only interrupted by actual legal incapacity to act, and the maxim non valens agere did not apply to such a case as the present.² It was not suggested that the defender was bound to live with the pursuer while she was carrying on an action of separation, but if that action were decided against her, and if she still refused to adhere, it was quite reasonable that the period of the currency of the action should be counted into the period of desertion.³ (3) Whether the deserted spouse had sufficiently dis-

he expressed the pursuer's continued desire that his wife should return and live with him, and his willingness, immediately on learning that Mrs M'Ewan agreed to come back, to make a home for her as soon as possible, and meanwhile to arrange for their living together in suitable apartments. Prior to this, on 11th June, the pursuer had written to his wife in affectionate terms, the sincerity of which I do not in the least doubt. The reply he got was from Mr Jones on 16th June, written in the third person, and briefly informing him that his wife had gone to Glasgow to consult a specialist, and would probably be there for some time. This announcement produced a letter from Mr Robson to Mr Jones, of 21st June, which speaks for itself. On 8th July Messrs Drummond & Reid wrote to Mr Robson asking for 'a definite reply to the matters referred to in our letters — (1) a voluntary separation; (2) custody of the child; and (3) aliment for Mrs M'Ewan and her child.' This letter was crossed in the post by a letter from Mr Robson to the defender's agents repeating his client's desire that his wife should return, and adding, 'as he had not only offered, but has urged this, and is willing thus to maintain and provide for her, he declines to furnish her with separate aliment.' The pursuer, as I understand, takes 8th July 1902 as the date at which, at the latest, the defender's desertion must be held to have commenced. On 12th August the pursuer and his wife had a personal meeting, and on the 16th he wrote her an affectionate letter. Again, on 7th October, a meeting took place at the defender's request, at which, as appears from a letter by the pursuer's agents, dated on the 8th, 'Mrs M'Ewan stated that she was prepared, as soon as she was stronger and sufficiently recovered, to return to live with her husband and try to be happy together.' On 3d November the defender called upon Mr Robson, who gives a distinct account of the interview. On the 6th Mr Robson wrote to the defender informing her that the pursuer had taken a house in Warrender Park Crescent, which she had recently seen with him, and would have it put in order and furnished without delay, so that she might return to and resume living with him;

M'Ewan v.
M'Ewan.

At advising on 18th July 1908,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I am of opinion that we should adhere to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship has examined the case with extreme care and minuteness, and I think your Lordships would, in any view, have been slow indeed to disturb that judgment so far as it is based upon facts. Probably I need in one sense say no more, but I should like to say this, that although in a case of this sort I always have bowed my own judgment on any dubious point to the judgment of the Judge who saw the witnesses, I have no hesitation in saying that reading the evidence, as I have, very carefully as a Judge of appeal, I should be inclined to take and asking her to meet the pursuer on an early day in order to select papers and colours for the rooms. The letter concludes, 'I am also instructed to say that, as you have already been informed, he wishes that neither your sister nor any members of your family should visit at or come to the house.' It was the fact that the pursuer had expressed this wish, which I do not think was in the circumstances unwise or unreasonable, at all events, as regarded the immediate future. The defender's reply, written on 7th November, is a very important letter, as bearing upon a legal point argued by her counsel, to be afterwards referred to. She says,—'I agree to the taking of the flat in Warrender Park Crescent. With regard to painting, furnishing, &c., will Mr M'Ewan be good enough to please himself as, in the circumstances, it is a matter in which I have no interest. I have made up my mind that, however Mr M'Ewan acts or whatever he says, I will try living with him for the sake of my helpless little boy. I wish another meeting, which Messrs Drummond & Reid will arrange for me.' The meeting desired by the defender was arranged for, and took place on the 19th. But before it took place, a most regrettable change of circumstances had arisen. A sharp disagreement had occurred between the defender and her sister, on the one part, and the nurse whose duty it was to bring the baby daily to their lodgings, on the other part. The ladies allege that Nurse Archibald had been intolerably rude to them, and had even slapped Miss Jones' face. The meeting on 19th November, from which the pursuer, under his agent's advice, absented himself, and at which Mr and Miss Jones was present, was wholly taken up with this dispute. Mr Robson's letter of 21st November describes the situation, and announces that the pursuer declined, 'in the interests of the child,' to comply with the defender's request that Nurse Archibald should be dismissed; and on 24th November Messrs Drummond & Reid wrote that the defender 'cannot go to the house in Warrender Park Crescent if the present nurse is to be retained. She is quite decided as to this.' On the 27th Mr Robson wrote, adhering to the position which the pursuer, under his advice, had taken up. Upon this matter of the nurse, the negotiations between the parties for a permanent reconciliation broke down; and in December the wife's action for separation was raised. It cannot, I think, be doubted that this rupture was a most unfortunate occurrence. The circumstances attending it have given me much anxiety, I confess that, in my judgment, the pursuer would have acted with more propriety if he had yielded to his wife's wishes, and got a new nurse for the child. It is not, even a stronger view than the Lord Ordinary has taken of the conduct of July 18, 1908. the parties. I think that I might say that the whole of the trouble in this M'Ewan v. case was from the very bad advice and evil influence that this lady got from M'Ewan. her own relations, and I think in particular that the conduct of the brother Ld. President and sister was such that Mr M'Ewan was well entitled, if he wished, to refuse that they should ever be in his house again.

Now, if it only rested upon fact I would say no more, but there are in the case one or two nice and delicate points of law on which I think it necessary to say a very few words. In the first place, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in the view which he takes in the first part of his note as to the true import of the case of *Mackenzie*¹ in the House of Lords. That is to say that I agree with him that in the House of Lords the view of the majority of the Judges in the Court of Session as to what was the true meaning of "reasonable cause" in the Act of 1573, cap. 55, was overturned, and the House of Lords held to my mind, clear upon which side lay the justice of the dispute as to the conduct of Nurse Archibald. The evidence is conflicting. But in any case I think it is matter for regret that the pursuer did not yield upon the point. It is, however, a very different affair to conclude that, in not so yielding, he was guilty either of cruelty in the legal sense, or of such conduct as could justify his wife in refusing to come back to him. I cannot adopt that conclusion. A number of reliable witnesses speak to the nurse's excellent treatment of the child; it is, to my mind, doubtful whether she had been guilty of insolence towards the defender and her sister; the matter was prima facie one upon which the pursuer was entitled to judge; and I am convinced that his resolution, mistaken as I conceive it to have been, was arrived at conscientiously upon the advice of his agent, who was also his uncle, upon whom he relied implicitly, and not from any intention of wounding his wife or being cruel to her. The judgment of Lord Low was pronounced on 8th December 1903. The agreement, which has been referred to, was signed on 9th and 11th January 1904. Since that time the parties have neither written nor spoken to one another. This action was raised on 18th July 1906.

"The defender's counsel argued that, even if his client must be held to have been in 'malicious and obstinate defection,' in April or in July 1902, the pursuer's action fails (a) because the defender had not been in such 'defection' for a full space of four years prior to 18th July 1906; and (b) because the pursuer had not, during that period, sufficiently complied with the duty incumbent upon him of endeavouring to persuade her to return. The former of these arguments included two quite separate branches. It was argued in the first place that the defender cannot be held to have been in desertion during the dependence of her action for separation, which, although not successful, was raised and fought out bona fide; and that the period, about a year, over which the litigation extended, must be cut out and disregarded, the result being that the necessary space of four years has not elapsed. I know of no authority for this contention, and I think it is unsound. It seems to me to derive no support from the case of Young, 1882, 10 R. 184, which was cited, where a wife's action was thrown out as irrelevant, because it appeared that, during the last two years of the period of alleged desertion, her husband had been, and still was, in prison. As Lord Adam justly observed, 'If during a part of that period the absence has been compulsory, it cannot, in my opinion, be affirmed to have been wilful.' Nor does the recent English decision in Craxton, May 8, 1907, 23

July 18, 1908. that nothing less will afford reasonable cause than that which would be sufficient as a defence to an action of adherence. I agree with him also M'Ewan v. that their Lordships in the House of Lords in that case treated it as M'Ewan. a question not decided, as far as they were concerned, whether, in an
Id. President. action of adherence, a wife can successfully defend herself upon any other grounds than would be required in order to sustain an action at her instance for separation and aliment. The Lord Ordinary goes on to express his opinion upon that question by intimating that he concurs with what Lord Rutherford Clark said in Mackenzie's case.¹ I do not hold that the House of Lords overturned that, but, on the other hand, I do think that they certainly spoke in such a way as to shew that they did not consider that matter binding on them, but that it was not necessary to decide it in that case. I do not think it is necessary to decide it in this case either, and for this very good reason, that even supposing the criterion was not

T. L. R. 527, appear to me to aid the defender's argument at all. I remain of the opinion upon the point which I expressed on 20th March last. It was urged by the defender's counsel that, if this view is sound, in a case where a separation action had been so prolonged as to extend over four years, a wife might, at the end of it, be then and there divorced for desertion. I do not think this result could follow. She would always have a locus poenitentiae to declare her willingness to adhere. On the other hand, if the defender's contention is sound, the result might, in the case figured, be that the husband would have to wait not four but eight years for his decree. The second branch of the defender's argument as regards the period of four years deserves, I think, more consideration, and raises what appears to me to be a delicate point, and one not covered by authority. Her counsel urged that the running of the statutory period was effectually interrupted, because during October and the beginning of November 1902 the parties were on friendly terms with one another, and on 7th November the defender wrote the letter to Mr Robson, which I quoted some time ago at length. It was urged that the parties had thus 'practically come together,' and that at all events on 7th November, it could not be said that the wife was 'remaining in malicious obstinacy.' This point has caused me more anxiety than any other in the case; but upon the whole, I think that it is not sound. It has, I am aware, been often laid down that the remedy of divorce for desertion is a very peculiar and a purely statutory one; and that care must be taken not to unduly extend its application. But I think one must regard the general mental attitude of the defender during the period as a whole, and not pay undue heed to temporary signs of softening, unfortunately abandoned, and never ripening into actual adherence. I think the defender's expression of willingness to adhere, for the sake of her child, was always under some reservation as to an improvement in her own health and strength; and even the letter of 7th November expressly conditions that a further meeting should be arranged. Most regrettably, as I have explained, the scene had materially altered before that meeting took place, and the overtures of 7th November came to nothing. If I am right in holding that the defender was in wilful non-adherence otherwise during the period in question, I cannot hold that anything that took place during this temporary brightening of the horizon was sufficient to bar the currency of the statutory period.

"The defender's remaining argument was based upon the pursuer's alleged failure to fulfil his duty in the way of persuading his wife to return to him.

what I may call the stricter criterion which Lord Rutherford Clark said it July 18, 1908. was—supposing it was the looser criterion—I think the ground here in fact which is set forth for the wife not adhering is utterly and absolutely inadequate. The ground which is put forth as having justified the wife in her eventual refusal to go home is that the husband declined, ante omnia, to dismiss the nurse, and the reasons for dismissing the nurse were said to be that the nurse had behaved very rudely to the wife and her sister, and there was a story of an assault upon the sister by the nurse. As far as that story is concerned I think it bears, if not absolute falsity, exaggeration, on the face of it. In fact I consider Miss Jones' testimony in these matters as entirely untrustworthy, and it seems to me out of the question to say that a wife is entitled to say she will no longer live with her husband because, forsooth, she having been absent for a long time, and a child of very tender years having been entirely looked after by a nurse almost from the moment it was born, the husband does not choose to dismiss the nurse before the wife comes home. All that sort of thing, if the wife had been allowed to come home, would have settled itself. All would have been well in that household, I am sure, if it had been given a chance; but to say that an incident of such a sort is to be a ground on which the wife is to resist one of the first duties of matrimony seems to me nothing less than absurd. Accordingly, I do not think we need solve that somewhat M'Ewan v.

M'Ewan.

Ed. President.

During the earlier part of the time in question no such charge could, I think, possibly be maintained against Mr M'Ewan. I have alluded to his letters and his conduct. I think he was sincerely anxious to get his wife back, and made it abundantly clear to her that he was so. But after the separation case was over, an agreement, as I have already explained, was entered into, to which Mr and Mrs M'Ewan and Mr Jones were parties. The first article of this document recorded, as matter of declaration and agreement by all parties, Mr M'Ewan's adherence to his former position as regarded his wife, and a repetition of his request and desire that she should return to him. It is true that after the agreement was signed he never again wrote to his wife. It may perhaps be regretted that he did not, and if he had been left to his own impulse, I think he probably would have done so. But he was advised by Mr Robson, and the advice was, in my judgment, legally correct, that the clause to which I have referred was a standing offer to his wife to return, and needed no further repetition. In my opinion, the pursuer was not, in the circumstances which I have detailed, bound to continue requests and entreaties which, it seems clear enough, must, if answered at all, have been answered in the negative. The limits of a deserted husband's duty in this regard were fully canvassed in the Whole Court case of Watson, 1890, 17 R. 736, where some difference of opinion arose. I think the question must be held to be largely one of circumstances. I assent to the view of Lord Kinnear in Willey's case, 11 R. 815, which was quoted with approval by the Lord President in the case of Watson, to the effect that in order to his success it is necessary that 'the deserted spouse is desirous to adhere, and takes some intelligible method of expressing that desire to the offender.' I cannot doubt that the pursuer here was throughout sincerely desirous to adhere, and that the defender thoroughly understood that he was so. There is some evidence as to occasions when the parties are said to have met and passed each other on the streets, but it is very vague and inconclusive, and I attach little importance to it.

"For the reasons which I have now stated, I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to decree. . . ."

M'Ewan v.
M'Ewan.

Id. President.

Now, the only other question from which I think comes any real trouble is the question whether, in calculating the four years, the wife was entitled to a deduction for the period during which an action of separation was running. Under the circumstances here I am of opinion that she was not. There is little or no authority on the matter in the books in this country, but the question does seem to have arisen in America; and although it is no authority that binds one, I think that one is fortified in one's view by the view which seems to have been taken there, and which I find in section 1758 of the last edition of Mr Bishop's book. After dealing with proceedings which are really a fraud on the Court, he goes on: "Or if after a desertion has commenced, there comes a real divorce suit, rendering a renewal of the cohabitation temporarily improper, still it does not interrupt the desertion; because, as an intent to continue the cohabitation will in the absence of explanation extend through the temporary separation of the last section,² so the intent will reach forward and govern the period of the divorce suit here stated." Now, taking the facts of this case, I think it is perfectly clear that although one would hesitate to say that when the lady originally went away from her husband's house, she did it with a mind then actually made up to desert, I think that that state of mind very rapidly supervened under the influence of her own relations. I think it was brought to an absolute point in the beginning of the next year, when, after a demand had been made by her for a separation, the whole matter had been carefully looked into by the husband's lawyer, and a perfectly clear and proper letter had been written by that gentleman, saying that he, having gone into the whole facts, had found nothing which would justify such a demand, and that it must be distinctly understood that the husband wished his wife to come back again. Well, after that period it seems to me the intention to desert is clear, and I think that if there was to be any action raised, it ought to have been raised then and there, at once. A long period after this is allowed to elapse, and after a time, when the wife seems almost to have been in a state of mind in which she was inclined to come back, she breaks off on this absurd pretext about the nurse, and raises then an action of separation in which she is entirely unsuccessful; it seems to me impossible in these circumstances that she should claim to have the period deducted. All these remarks seem to be enormously strengthened when I remember the fact that up to this hour there has never been an offer by this lady to come back. It would be a perfectly different question if what your Lordships were deciding was a case in which the wife was at your Lordships' bar, saying, "I am willing to live with my husband to-morrow; don't settle it that the axe has fallen, that the last hour of the four years is run out, and that I am divorced"; whereas here you have persistent desertion maintained to this very hour. I am entirely of the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, and think his judgment should be adhered to.

Lord
Polwarth v.
North British Railway Co.

Railway—Owner of cattle undertaking risk of carriage if sent by route specified—Damage sustained on different route—Contract—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 31), sec. 7.—A Railway Company agreed with the owner of three head of cattle consigned by rail from Maxton Station to Alnwick, via Kelso, for exhibition at a cattle show at Alnwick, that if they were not sold they should be taken back to Maxton at half fare, provided the owner consigned them by the same route as that by which they had been sent, and undertook the risk of their conveyance. Between Kelso and Alnwick there were two railway routes equally convenient, one by Wooler, the other by Tweedmouth. The Railway Company sent the cattle to Alnwick by the Wooler route. The cattle were not sold at the show, and the owner's agent in sending them back from Alnwick Station signed a consignment note bearing that they were sent for carriage back to Maxton "by the same route as on the journey here, at the reduced rate," "and in consideration of your charging such reduced rate" "the undersigned agrees to free and relieve you of all liability" for loss or damage, unless caused by wilful misconduct on the part of their servants. The Railway Company chose to send the cattle back by the Tweedmouth route and they were destroyed by fire at Tweedmouth Junction.

In an action brought by the owner of the cattle against the Railway Company for £800 as the value of the cattle the defenders maintained (1) that they were not liable, as they had sent them back by the route contracted for, viz., by Kelso; (2) that the stipulation that they should be returned by the same route was a stipulation solely for their own benefit, and conferred no right on the sender of the cattle; (3) that in any view their liability was restricted to £15 for each animal, in respect that no declaration of an excess value was made on behalf of the owner in terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, sec. 7.

Held (1) that the Railway Company had broken the contract, and could not found on the indemnity clause therein, but (2) that their liability for the loss of the cattle was limited to £15 per animal.

THIS action was raised on 1st February 1905 by Lord Polwarth, 2nd Division. Mertoun House, St Boswells, against the North British Railway Company and the North-Eastern Railway Company, jointly and severally, for payment of £800. Ld. Johnston.

The following narrative is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Johnston):—"This action is raised by Lord Polwarth to establish liability against the North British Railway Company and the North-Eastern Railway Company jointly, or jointly and severally, Nov. 15, 1907. for the loss of three head of cattle destroyed at Tweedmouth Junction on their way back to Maxton, the station for Lord Polwarth's estate of Mertoun, from the Northumberland Agricultural Society's show at Alnwick on 13th July 1904.

Lord
Polwarth v.
North British
Railway Co.

"The cattle were despatched from Maxton on the morning of 12th July, via Kelso, and travelled by the short route by Coldstream and Wooler to Alnwick. They were returned on the afternoon of the 13th from Alnwick, via Alnmouth Junction, to Berwick, and thence back to Tweedmouth, with the intention of sending them from Tweedmouth, via Coldstream and Kelso, to Maxton. While standing at Tweedmouth Junction the truck in which the cattle were caught fire and they were destroyed.

"The cattle being prize animals, the sum of £800 is claimed as their value.

"The question raised or intended to be raised depends first upon the special contract made by Lord Polwarth, through his factor, Mr Campbell, with the Company or Companies for the transit of the cattle, and second upon the fact that the North-Eastern Company returned the cattle, via Berwick and not via Wooler, and the effect thereof.

"The admitted situation is that Maxton Station is on the North British Railway between St Boswell's Junction and Kelso; that from Kelso to Sprouston is part of the North British line, but is worked by the North-Eastern, and the traffic between the two Companies is exchanged at Kelso, so that practically the North-Eastern line may be said to begin at Kelso; that from Kelso Alnwick can be reached by two routes of the North-Eastern—one, the shorter, via Coldstream and Wooler, the other, the longer, via Coldstream, Tweedmouth, and Alnmouth; that the route via Tweedmouth frequently involves the traffic being taken to Berwick and back to Tweedmouth; that besides the routes above mentioned, traffic between Maxton and Alnwick could be taken by a third but a very roundabout route, via Duns and Reston, to Berwick, on the North British, and thence via Tweedmouth and Alnmouth, on the North-Eastern, to Alnwick.

"An arrangement exists, as was not denied, though the details of the arrangement and the precise relations of the Companies were not before me, between the North-Eastern and the North British Railway Companies (and I gather that the agreement is a general one among all railway companies in the kingdom) for the transit of cattle for bona fide show purposes to and from agricultural meetings at freight and a-half, i.e., freight for going and half freight for returning. But in order to obtain the benefit of such reduction of freight a somewhat elaborate system of documents requires to pass, the precise terms of which are essential to the contract between Lord Polwarth and the Railway Companies.

"In the first place, before the cattle start on the outward and return journeys respectively declarations are required, Nos. 13 and 16 of process, to be handed to the station-agents at the point of shipment for the outward and homeward journeys. These declarations are each of them headed North-Eastern Railway. What the precise relation between the North British and the North-Eastern Railway Companies in the matter is, as I have already said, not disclosed, but the terms preclude the North-Eastern from denying that the North British was at least their agent, except on the footing of denying authority and disclaiming the transaction altogether. But without detailed information there is practically no doubt, having regard to the known relations of the two lines, that as between themselves there exist arrangements for through traffic which cover the occasion in question. Nov. 15, 1907.

“No. 13 of process [headed ‘Agricultural Show Traffic’—‘To the Show’], commences with a certificate by the Secretary to the Agricultural Society that the stock had been entered by Lord Polwarth for exhibition. The rest of the document is titled a certificate, but is in reality one side of an agreement, which, if stock are tendered and accepted for transit on the faith of it, becomes mutual. In consideration of the North British receiving and forwarding the stock under the conditions applicable to agricultural show traffic, Lord Polwarth, through his factor, undertook to relieve the North British Company, and all other companies over whose lines the animals might pass, from all liability for loss, &c., except upon proof that such loss, &c., arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the servants of such companies. Lord Polwarth v.
North British
Railway Co.

“Indorsed upon this document are ‘General Conditions of Conveyance,’ which I understand to be the conditions applicable to agricultural show traffic, as none others are referred to. Of these the important articles are that the stock is conveyed—(8) to the show at ordinary rates. (9) From the show, if sold, at ordinary rates. (10) From the show, if unsold, at half rates back to the station whence sent. (1) The live stock can only be conveyed at the owner’s risk. (6) On returning, if the animals remain unsold, the exhibitors must produce a certificate of the fact, issued by the secretary of the society and signed by the exhibitor, in order to be entitled to the privilege of having the stock charged at half rates. (7) In order to secure the return of the live stock at half rates if unsold, the exhibitors must in every case take care to consign them on the return journey by the same route as they were sent to the meeting, otherwise full rates will be charged.

“On delivery of this document to the station-agent at Maxton on 12th July 1904, the usual owner’s risk consignment note (No. 12 of pro.) was prepared by the agent and signed by W. Henderson, the man in charge of the cattle, whose authority from Lord Polwarth was not disputed. It bore simply that the cattle were consigned from Maxton to Alnwick via Kelso, although it must be conceded that it was the understanding of both parties that they would travel via Wooler.

“What Henderson signed was a request that the cattle ‘be carried at the special or reduced rate, in consideration whereof he agreed to relieve the North British Company, and all other companies over whose lines the stock might pass, from all liability for loss, &c., except upon proof that such loss, &c., arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the Company’s servants.’ . . .

“On the return journey the document No. 16 of process, also signed by Mr Campbell, Lord Polwarth’s factor, was handed to the station-agent at Alnwick, similar in terms with the document No. 13 of process, and having the same general conditions of conveyance indorsed, except that it bore the word ‘returned’ as part of the heading ‘Agricultural Show Traffic,’ and ‘from the show’ instead of ‘to the show,’ and also bore a certificate by the Agricultural Society’s secretary that the stock had been exhibited, instead of had been entered for exhibition, and was addressed, not to the North British, but to the North-Eastern and North British Companies. But then the document No. 16 of process was supplemented by the document No. 15, Nov. 15, 1907. signed by Henderson, the man in charge, and admittedly representing Lord Polwarth. This bore a declaration, first of all, that the stock had been exhibited and had not been sold, and was still the bona fide property of the exhibitor; and in the second place, a request . . . in terms very similar to that which is embodied in the North British consignment note No. 12. In fact No. 15, with the North-Eastern consignment note No. 14, are the North-Eastern's counterpart of the North British consignment note No. 12.

Lord
Polwarth v.
North British
Railway Co.

"But though the terms are very similar generally, and have the same object, viz., to relieve the Railway Companies from loss, except for wilful misconduct on the part of their servants, and the contract is to be deemed to be made separately with all companies parties to any through rates under which the stock is carried, there is this important difference, that the consignment is expressly 'for carriage back to the station named' in the schedule indorsed, which station is Maxton, North British ' (from which station such animals or goods were consigned here for the above-mentioned show) by the same route as on the journey here at the reduced rate below your ordinary rate, and in consideration of your charging such reduced rate,' &c. The italics are the Company's. Neither in this nor in the consignment note No. 14 is any route otherwise mentioned, but merely the station of destination, viz., Maxton.

"It is maintained, in the first place, for the defenders that their liability is, in any event, limited to £15 per animal, in respect that no declaration of an excess value was made on behalf of Lord Polwarth in terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, section 7; and, in the second place, that the stock was, at the time of the fire, being carried under an owner's risk special contract, which exempted them from liability, in respect that no wilful misconduct on the part of their servants was alleged.

"Lord Polwarth's answer is, that assuming that both or either of these defences might, under other circumstances, have been available to the defenders, they cannot in the actual circumstances be pleaded, in respect that the companies had broken their contract with him by diverting the traffic round by Berwick and Tweedmouth, instead of sending it back by the route by which it came."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having contracted with the defenders the North British Railway Company for the carriage, by themselves or their agents, of the said animals to and from the said show, and the said company having failed to carry them safely, they are liable in damages as concluded for, both at common law and under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, section 17. (2) Assuming that the defenders the North British Railway Company contracted with the defenders the North-Eastern Railway Company, as agents for the pursuer, or that the North British Company acted throughout as agents for the North-Eastern Company, or that otherwise the pursuer's claim is against the North-Eastern Company, the said latter Company is similarly liable to the pursuer in damages as concluded for. (3) Assuming any limitation of the liability of either Company under said schedule or otherwise, such limitation is excluded (1st) by reason of the said unauthorised deviation in the return journey; (2d) by reason of the said loss and damage having been caused by fire.

The defenders, inter alia, pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action in respect that the animals were at the time of the fire being carried under an owner's risk special contract. (4) The pursuer's loss not having been caused by the negligence or default of the defenders or their servants, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor. (6) No declaration having been made by or on behalf of the pursuer in terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, section 7, the defenders are not in any event liable in excess of £15 for each animal.*

On 20th July 1905 the Lord Ordinary continued the cause till the first sederunt-day in October to give the pursuer an opportunity of lodging a minute of amendment.†

* The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 31), enacts:—

Sec. 2. "Every railway company, canal company, and railway and canal company, shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic" (which term by section 1 includes animals) "upon and from the several railways and canals belonging to or worked by such companies respectively. . . ."

Sec. 7. "Every such company as aforesaid shall be liable for the loss of or for any injury done to any horses, cattle, or other animals, or to any articles, goods, or things, in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made and given by such company contrary thereto, or in anywise limiting such liability; every such notice, condition, or declaration being hereby declared to be null and void:"

Provided always, that no greater damages shall be recovered for the loss of or for any injury done to any of such animals beyond the sums hereinafter mentioned; (that is to say) . . . for any neat cattle, per head fifteen pounds, . . . unless the person sending or delivering the same to such company shall, at the time of such delivery, have declared them to be respectively of higher value than as above mentioned. . . ."

"Lord Polwarth's answer requires, first, a consideration of the contract, and, second, of certain English authorities bearing upon the point.

"I am of opinion, in the first place, that it is not open to the Railway Company to plead that the condition indorsed on the documents Nos. 13 and 16, to the effect that the traffic must be consigned on the return journey by the same route as that by which they were sent, is one entirely in their favour, and which may be waived by them if they find it convenient—Bidoulac, 17 R. 144. I do not need to determine absolutely whether this might or might not have been so on the documents Nos. 13 and 16 of process, for the matter does not rest on these documents alone; it rests also on the document No. 15 of process, which having been accepted and the cattle delivered for carriage on the faith of it, becomes a mutual contract for the return journey 'by the same route as on the journey here.'

"But the Railway Companies maintain further that the word 'route' is elastic, and that they were not confined to transmitting the stock by the same line of rails by which it had come, but were entitled to return it by any combination of their lines, for though they did not put their argument precisely in these words, I cannot find any other which accurately defines it. I think they limit their contention to this, that so long as they send back by Kelso, it is open to them to send either by Wooler or Tweedmouth. But it appears to me that if their contention is good at all, it would warrant their returning the traffic by Reston and St Boswells, or by any other possible route on their combined systems—say Edinburgh and St Boswells. I cannot hold that the word 'route' has this extended meaning, even with

Nov. 15, 1907.

Lord
Polwarth v.
North British Railway Co.

The pursuer having lodged a minute making the amendments desiderated by the Lord Ordinary, and the defenders having stated that they did not propose to raise further the question of relevancy, the limitation which the Company indicates. I think that 'route,' particularly in the phrase 'the same route,' as 'on the journey here,' imports a definite line within the system of a company, or within the combined system of two companies, and not merely the system or systems of one or both as a whole. I do not suggest that this view could be pressed to the extreme point, as, for instance, to involve a breach of contract if traffic which was taken through Carstairs station were returned by the Carstairs loop line without entering the station; but without pressing the argument to such an extreme, I cannot hold that the route from Alnwick, by Alnmouth and Tweedmouth or Berwick, was not an entirely different route from that by Wooler, and one to which pursuer might reasonably have objected had it been proposed to him as sufficient implement of the Company's contract.

"I think it is not unfair to test this point by putting the converse proposition. Suppose at Alnwick the pursuer for his own advantage or convenience had booked his cattle back to Maxton via Tweedmouth or Berwick, could he have had any answer to the Company's demand for full freight on the return journey? In my opinion he would not.

"But I am bound, in the second place, to consider the English authorities founded upon, as they appear to bear very closely on the question.

"I do not think that the case of Great Western Railway Company v. McCarthy, 1887, L. R., 12 App. C. 218, goes further than to determine that the clause in the owner's risk contract note of both the companies concerned imported quite a legal condition exempting from liability under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, section 7, provided a proper alternative was given, and in the present case no question is apparently raised on this score, but the three cases—Morritt v. North-Eastern Railway Company (1876), L. R., 1 Q. B. D. 302; Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company, L. R., [1899] 1 Q. B. 309; and Foster v. Great Western Railway Company, L. R., [1904] 2 K. B. 306—are more apposite, and the latter was founded upon as the ruling case, and as deciding the present question in favour of the Railway Companies.

"I pass over Morritt's case, as it may be referred to the same principle as Foster's case.

"The real question is between Mallet's case and Foster's case, and whether Mallet's case is a sound judgment and applicable to the present, or is substantially overruled by Foster's. In Mallet's case the contract was to carry from Lowestoft to Jersey via London, the Great Western Railway, and Plymouth, whereas the receiving company transmitted goods from London via the London and South-Western Railway and Southampton. This was done by mistake of their servants, who misread the direction, which was not very distinctly written. There was delay in the transmission and consequent loss. It was held that the delay was delay in the performance of the contract, and arose in consequence of the defendants' doing something which was wholly at variance with the contract.

"But in Foster's case the circumstances were different. The goods were being carried also to Jersey, and they ought to have been transmitted from Exeter via London and South-Western to Southampton. But they were accidentally carried past Exeter, and when the mistake was discovered it was too late to send them back to Exeter to catch the Southampton boat, and the Railway Company did what was best in the circumstances by sending them via Weymouth, which was a totally different route from that by which they had undertaken to carry them. The decision was that the breach of their contract was at Exeter, but that it was occasioned by their servants' negligence but not wilful misconduct, and that they were there-and sixth pleas in law for the defenders, and allowed the parties a proof of their averments as to, inter alia, the value of the cattle in question." *

Lord
Polwarth v
North British Railway Co.

fore protected by the relieving clause in their contract, that after Exeter they were no longer obliged to have recourse to that clause, because they were no longer carrying under the contract, but as bailees of the goods were doing their best in the circumstances. And the case was carefully distinguished from that of Mallet. It is quite true that in the opinions of the Judges who gave judgment in the case, and particularly of Lord Alverstone, there is an undercurrent of dissatisfaction with the case of Mallet, but it goes no further. It may be that it is justified, if it be held that in Mallet's case at London a similar mistake was made to that made in Foster's case at Exeter, but even if this be so, neither Foster's case nor Mallet's case; assuming it to be corrected by the judgment in Foster's, is like the present. Here there was no mistake in transit. There was a deliberate diversion of the route from the beginning, and I do not think that the doubts indicated in Foster's case strike at the grounds of judgment in Mallet's case, but merely their application in the circumstances. But whether these grounds of judgment properly applied in Mallet's case or not, they apply, in my opinion, here, and I cannot hold them displaced by Foster's case.

"I speak of the above cases with the respect due to them as decisions pronounced by the English Courts in pari materia though not binding on me, but I should myself have adopted the ground of judgment in Mallet's case in the circumstances of the present.

"On the documents therefore upon which the case must ultimately depend, and on which it was argued by the pursuer, I should be prepared to hold that he might have a good case to recover untrammelled by the owner's risk contract embodied in the special agreement for carriage to and from the show. But then the documents are not his record, but are only embodied in it, and that insufficiently, by reference, and while Mr Mackintosh presented a very able argument upon the documents and authorities, he failed, to my mind, to connect them with his record. . . . I shall therefore continue the case to give him an opportunity of considering his position."

* "OPINION.— . . . The defenders having asked to be reheard on their sixth plea in law, I have now heard a full argument, and have reconsidered the question, with the result that I shall now repel the plea.

"Prior to the passing of the Carriers Act, 1830 (11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. cap. 68), common carriers were practically in the position of guaranteeing the safe delivery of goods which they accepted for carriage. And all goods which they accepted for carriage for one person, they were bound to carry for all the lieges. The law, however, allowed them to relieve themselves, by notice published with the intent to limit such heavy responsibility. But in respect of the practice of persons tendering for carriage, parcels, the value of which was grossly disproportionate to the bulk, without notifying to the carrier the value and nature of the contents, and of the difficulty of fixing parties with knowledge of such limiting notices, the Legislature thought fit, by section 1 of the above Act of 1830, to enact that no common carrier by land for hire should 'be liable for the loss of or injury to any article or articles of property of the descriptions following'—[and then followed an enumeration of bullion, gold, and silver-plate, jewellery, bank-notes, paintings, china, silks, furs, lace, and other articles of similar nature of value disproportionate to bulk]—contained in any parcel or package delivered for carriage 'when the value of such article or articles or property aforesaid, contained in such parcel or package, shall exceed the sum of £10, unless at the time of the delivery thereof . . . the value and nature of such article or articles or property shall have been declared by

Nov. 15, 1907.

Lord
Polwarth v.
North British Railway Co.

A joint minute of admissions for the parties was then lodged, in which they agreed in stating—(1) That the value of the animals in question should be held to be £550. (2) That the animals died in consequence of the injuries caused by fire while in the waggon. And (3) that certain general notices (in which defenders declared they were not common carriers of cattle) had been publicly exhibited by the defenders; and quoad ultra renounced further probation.

On 22d February 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this inter-the person sending or delivering the same, and such increased charge as hereinafter mentioned, or an engagement to pay the same, be accepted by the person receiving such parcel or package.' By this provision, therefore, the carrier was entirely relieved for the loss of or injury to any such article, unless it was declared, and what was practically a premium of insurance paid.

"But when railways and canals came practically to supersede the common carriers of 1830, while the Act of 1830 still continued to regulate the carriers' liability where it applied, a further limitation was found necessary, and was introduced by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, section 7, but the relief given was not absolute, but qualified and limited." (His Lordship here quoted the section.)

"It was maintained that this provision limited the defenders' liability for the loss of the pursuer's cattle to the sum of £15 per head, in respect that he had not declared them to be of higher value and paid the consequent increased freight. But I think that the grounds on which I have already disposed of the defenders' third plea in law apply to the plea founded upon this provision, and warrants my rejecting it. I think that it is an implied condition of the Railway Company taking benefit by the limitation of liability provided, that they shall carry on the contract on which the cattle were delivered.

"I have again considered the English authorities to which I was referred at the first debate and certain further authorities which were quoted, but I have not changed my view of their bearing.

"The former authorities quoted were Morritt v. North-Eastern Railway, 1 Q. B. D. 302; Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway [1899], 1 Q. B. 309; and Foster v. Great Western Railway Company [1904], 2 K. B. 306. I am prepared on further perusal to admit that Mallet's case was wrongly decided, and that it was in reality not distinguished, but disapproved, by the Court of King's Bench in Foster's case. But that does not alter my view of the bearing of the two other cases. They determine that a mistake even negligently made by a railway company in the course of executing the contract of carriage, which resulted in goods being diverted from the route by which they were contracted to be carried, did not deprive the companies in the one case of the benefit of the provision of section 1 of the Carriers Act, 1830, and in the other case of the benefit of a special condition just and reasonable, and therefore permissible to be made, under section 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854. But they leave open the question what is to happen when the mistake or the neglect or the default occurs, not in course of executing the contract, but where the contract is never even commenced to be executed.

"The distinction between these cases and certain others to which I will immediately refer, was, I think, correctly noted by Lord Blackburn, then Mr Justice Blackburn, when he says in Morritt's case, at 1 Q. B. D. 304,— 'in each of these' (that is, the latter cases) 'there was an intentional act on the part of the defendants in sending on or misdelivering the goods; here there was only negligence.'

"The new cases to which I have been referred are Sleat v. Fagg, 5 Barn. & Ald. 342, and 24 R. R. 407, and Garnet v. Willan, 5 Barn. & Ald. 53, locutor :—" Having considered the cause along with the joint minute of admissions, inter alia, assessing the value of the cattle in question at £550 sterling, and renouncing further probation, decerns against the defenders, conjunctly and severally, for the agreed-on sum of £550 sterling, with interest thereon, as concluded for in the summons."* Nov. 15, 1907.

Lord Polwarth v.
North British
Railway Co.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The cattle were con-and 24 R. R. 276, in both of which carriers were held responsible for loss notwithstanding notice equivalent to the provisions of the Carriers Act, 1830, brought home to the knowledge of their customer, because they were not carrying under their contract, but outwith their contract, and these decisions seem to me to support the view which I have already expressed. I was also referred to Hearn v. London and South-Western Railway, 24 L. J. Kx. 180; Millen v. Brasch, 10 Q. B. D. 142; and Hendon v. Caledonian Railway Company, 7 R. 966. The first two are illustrative of the general question; the latter, like the cases of Sleat and Garnet, is more directly in line with the present.

"In fact I remain of the opinion which I formerly held, that the question at issue in the case depends upon whether Lord Polwarth's cattle were returned 'by the same route as on the journey' out. I have already expressed my reason for the opinion that they were not so returned. If so, they were not carried on the contract, but contrary to the contract of carriage. . . ."

* "OPINION.—(After stating that negligence had not been proved, his Lordship continued)—But the case has been taken throughout on the footing that the pursuer founded entirely on breach of contract, and though I think that their record might have deduced this more pointedly, I think that it is their real case on record. If so, then the contract was broken; the cattle were not carried on it, but in contravention of it. It was no mere negligence or fault of the defenders' employees diverting the cattle in transit. They never were carried on the contract at all, and this was done intentionally. Whether for the defenders' convenience, or whether it was assumed that the pursuer would thereby get better expedition, does not appear to me to affect the question. Under their contract the defenders, whether they were common carriers or carrying on a special contract, were bound to deliver the cattle at Maxton, and they could not do so. They cannot, therefore, plead any of the conditions of the contract to excuse their breach. Nor can they so plead the statutory limitation of liability, for the statute subsumes a contract of carriage, and that the carriage proceeds under that contract. I cannot distinguish from Hendon v. Caledonian Railway, 1880, 7 R. 966, in Scotland; and from Sleat v. Fagg, 1822, 24 R. R. 407; Lilley v. Doubleday, 1881, L. R., 7 Q. B. D. 510, and Royal Exchange Shipping Company v. Dixon, 1886, L. R., 12 A. C. 11, in England. The damage then is the value of the cattle. 'The question is whether the defendant was responsible for the goods, and if so the damage must be their value' (per Lindley, J., in Lilley v. Doubleday, supra, and cf. Ellis v. Turner, 1800, 5 R. R. 441), unless indeed the damage was too remote. But this I cannot hold in face of the English cases of Davis v. Garrett, 1830, 31 R. R. 524; Scaramanga v. Stamp, 1880, L. R., 5 C. P. D. 295, to which I have referred. I do not think that even a damnum fatale would have excused the defenders, but the defenders do not attempt to shew that the accident was occasioned by the agency of nature, and could not reasonably have been avoided—Nugent v. Smith, 1876, L. R., 1 C. P. D. 423.

"I shall therefore decern against the defenders for the agreed-on sum of £550, with expenses. I do not think that there should be any modification in respect of the amendment of record, for if the defenders did not add to their statement in defence they brought forward for the first time the important plea last disposed of, and occasioned the third hearing."

Nov. 15, 1907. signed from Maxton by Kelso, which left it open to the Railway Company to send them either by Wooler or by Tweedmouth, and to return them by either route without regard to the route by which they had been sent. The request by the owner to send the cattle back by the same route was to be construed in the same way as leaving the option with the Railway Company, provided they were sent by Kelso. (2) The stipulation by the Railway Company that they should be returned by the same route was inserted solely for their own benefit, and they could waive it.¹ (3) There was no wilful misconduct on the part of the defenders in sending the cattle by Tweedmouth to avoid delay.² (4) The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, sec. 7, applied, and limited the defenders' liability to £15.³

Polwarth v.
North British Railway Co.

Argued for the pursuer;—By returning the cattle by a route not that specified, the defenders had put themselves outside the contract, and had lost the benefit of the limitation of liability under it, and also of the limitation under sec. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act. The pursuer's case rested on the general law of contract.⁴ The intentional breach of contract by the defenders distinguished this case from Morritt v. North-Eastern Railway Company, and other cases cited.

At advising on 15th November 1907,—

LORD LOW.—The instructions which the pursuer gave to the defenders to convey his cattle from Maxton to the Agricultural Show at Alnwick were to convey them via Kelso. Those instructions were indefinite to this extent, that beyond Kelso there were two routes—one by Wooler and the other by Tweedmouth—both upon the defenders' system, by either of which the cattle might have been sent to Alnwick, and between which there was little difference either as regarded distances or convenience. It was stated by the pursuer's counsel that the intention was that the cattle should be sent by the Wooler route, because it was arranged that the cattle truck should be taken from Maxton by a train which ran in connection with a Wooler train. If that had been admitted or proved it might have been sufficient to shew that "via Kelso" meant in this particular case via Kelso and Wooler, but there is neither admission nor evidence on the point. All that we know is that the cattle were consigned to Alnwick via Kelso, and if that was all that the defenders were requested and agreed to do, I am inclined to think (although in the view which I take of the Nov. 15, 1907. case it is unnecessary to decide the point) that it was open to take the cattle via Tweedmouth.

The cattle were in fact conveyed by the Wooler route. They were safely delivered at Alnwick, and no question arises in regard to the journey thither.

Lord
 Polwarth v.
 North British Railway Co.
 Lord Low.

At the close of the show the cattle not having been sold required to be returned to Maxton. The defenders give special terms to persons sending live stock to agricultural shows upon certain conditions. They, inter alia, charge only half rates for the return journey of stock which is not sold, but only upon the condition that "the exhibitor must in every case take care to consign them on the return journey by the same route as they were sent to the meeting, otherwise full rates will be charged."

The pursuer was naturally desirous to have his cattle returned at half rates, and accordingly his servant, who had charge of the cattle, filled up and signed the form supplied by the defenders of a special contract for the return of unsold cattle from a show at half rates. The document runs thus:—"You are requested by the undersigned to receive the cattle in question for carriage back" to Maxton "by the same route as on the journey here, at the reduced rate below your ordinary rate, and in consideration of your charging such reduced rate for the carriage thereof the undersigned hereby undertakes to free and relieve you" of all liability for loss or damage, unless caused by wilful misconduct on the part of the company's servants.

Although these were the terms of the contract for the return journey, the defenders did not send the cattle via Wooler, but via Tweedmouth. During the journey the truck in which the cattle were being conveyed took fire, to the effects of which they all ultimately succumbed. The question to be determined in this case is, Whether the defenders are liable in damages to the pursuer for the loss which he has sustained, and if so, what is the measure of their liability?

The defenders maintain (1) that they are not liable to any extent, in respect that by the contract the pursuer relieved them of all liability for loss, unless the loss was occasioned by the wilful misconduct of their servants, which is not alleged; and (2) that in any view they were not liable in a larger sum than £15 for each animal in terms of the 7th section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854.

In support of their contention that they are liable to no extent, the defenders argued, in the first place, that the words in the contract, "by the same route as on the journey here," meant the route by which the cattle were consigned when sent to the show, namely, via Kelso, and that as they (the defenders) had the option of taking the cattle either by Wooler or Tweedmouth on the outward journey, they had the same option on the return journey. I am of opinion that that argument is not well founded.
 The words in the contract for the return journey which I have quoted seem to me, according to their natural and ordinary signification, to mean the route by which the journey to Alnwick was as matter of fact made, and I do not think that it is competent to read them as meaning something else, by reference to a prior and entirely separate contract.

Nov. 15, 1907.

Lord
Polwarth v.
North British Railway Co.

Lord Low.

The defenders further argued that the stipulation in regard to the route was inserted solely for their benefit, because they only agreed to carry the cattle at half rates on the return journey upon the condition that the pursuer should consent to the cattle being sent back by the same route as that by which they had come. The stipulation therefore (the defenders argued) although binding upon the pursuer was not binding on them, and that so long as they only charged half rates as for the Wooler route they could send the cattle by another route if they found it more convenient to do so.

Here again I am unable to accept the defenders' argument. If the argument be sound, the defenders were entitled to convey the cattle by any route they chose, and would not be bound to consider whether it was equally convenient and safe for the pursuer as the specified route. To say that the defenders had such power seems to me to be out of the question, seeing that the pursuer had agreed that the cattle should be conveyed at his risk. No doubt he took the risk in consideration of the reduced rate which was charged for the carriage, but he also took the risk for the route which was specified, and for no other.

I am therefore of opinion that the defenders were in breach of their contract in taking the cattle by Tweedmouth, and that they cannot found upon the indemnity clause in the contract.

The question remains whether the defenders' liability is limited in amount by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854? The Lord Ordinary has answered that question in the negative, holding that the Act applies only where a railway company is carrying cattle under a contract, and that in this case the route adopted by the defenders having from its commencement been a different route from that specified, they were altogether outside of their contract. Whether that view be sound or not appears to me to depend upon the construction of the statute.

By the second section it is enacted that every railway company shall "afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic," and traffic is defined as including animals. A railway company therefore is bound to carry cattle.

By the seventh section it is enacted that every railway company "shall be liable for the loss of or for any injury done to any horses, cattle, or other animals . . . in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants . . . provided always that no greater damages shall be recovered for the loss of or for any injury done to any of such animals beyond the sums hereinafter mentioned (that is to say) . . . for any neat cattle per head fifteen pounds," unless the person sending the animals shall have declared them to be of a higher value, in which case the company is authorised to demand a reasonable percentage upon the excess of value so declared.

In this case the pursuer made no declaration of value, and accordingly, if the statute applies, he cannot recover from the defenders more than £15 for each of the cattle.

What, therefore, the Railway Company is by the statute made liable for is the loss of or injury to cattle "in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof." Now, unquestionably, the defenders received the cattle from the pursuer's servant for the purpose of forwarding them to Maxton, and they were in fact forwarding them to Maxton when the fire occurred. Prima facie, therefore, the Act applies. But it was said that the defenders cannot be regarded as having been acting as carriers for the pursuer at all, because they intentionally and deliberately adopted a route which was wholly different from that by which alone the pursuer had agreed that the cattle should be conveyed. Nov. 15, 1907.

Lord Polwarth v. North British Railway Co.
Lord Low.

The force of that argument lies in the fact that the defenders intentionally adopted a different route from that stipulated, and that fact differentiates this case from those in which the contract has been departed from by mere mistake or carelessness, as, for example, when goods have been despatched upon the contract route but have afterwards been negligently shunted on to the wrong line or put into the wrong train at a junction, or where goods have been carried on beyond the station at which they ought to have been delivered. It seems to me, however, that the fact that there has been intentional departure from the contract route does not of itself solve the question. Suppose that cattle were being sent to an agricultural show, or to be sold at a market to be held on a particular day, and that after they had been carried a certain distance along the contract route it was found that the line ahead was blocked,—I cannot doubt that railway officials could send the cattle on by another route by which they could arrive at their destination in time for the show or market, without losing the benefit of the statute in the event of the cattle being killed or injured after they had been diverted from the contract route.

In this case we do not know the reasons which led the defenders to send the cattle via Tweedmouth, because there is neither admission nor evidence upon the point, and probation has been renounced. It is not averred, however, that there was anything of the nature of wilful misconduct, in the ordinary sense of these words, on the defenders' part, or that they took the cattle via Tweedmouth for any other purpose than to deliver them to the pursuer at Maxton. The Dean of Faculty gave an illustration intended to enforce his argument that the defenders having intentionally departed from the contract could not found upon the statute. The case which he supposed was that the pursuer had been in debt to the defenders, and that they had resolved to hold the cattle against the debt, and for that purpose had carried them off to York. I agree that in that case the statute would not have applied, because the defenders would not have been engaged as carriers in receiving, forwarding, or delivering the cattle. In the case which happened, however, they were acting as carriers and in no other capacity. When the accident occurred they were carrying the pursuer's cattle to the appointed destination, and there was nothing in the nature of appropriation of the cattle to their own use, or of handing them over to another carrier, or of sending them to the wrong destination or the wrong person. It therefore appears to me that the defenders did not by their breach of contract put themselves outside of the statute, and I am confirmed in that view by the highly authoritative judgment which was given in regard to a similar question under the Carriers Act in Morrill v. North-Eastern Railway Company.¹

1288 CASES DECIDED IN THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

Nov. 15, 1907. I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to recover more than £45, being the statutory maximum amount allowed when no declaration of value is made.

Lord
Polwarth v.
North British Railway Co.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD STORMONTH-DARLING concurred.

LORD ARDWALL was sitting in the Extra Division.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 22d February 1907, and decerned for payment by the defenders, conjunctly and severally, to the pursuer of the sum of £45, with interest.

INDEX OF MATTERS

1908 SESSION CASES.

ACCOUNTING. Appropriation of Payments.

Where a debtor has paid money on account to his creditor, if the debtor has not appropriated particular payments to particular debts, the appropriation is governed by the intention of the creditor, express, implied, or presumed. Hay & Co. v. Torbet, Dec. 17, 1907, p. 781.

A firm of cattle auctioneers rendered an account to a customer setting forth, in a column in order of date, cattle, &c., sold to the customer, and cash advances made to him, and in another column, below the first, in order of date, the payments made by the customer to the auctioneers. The columns were each added up, and the balance was struck by deducting the amount of the second column from the amount of the first. Held that the account was not an account-current to which the rule as to the appropriation of payments applied. Hay & Co. v. Torbet, Dec. 17, 1907, p. 781.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. Law-agent—Disclosure of former client's address.

Where an agent has ceased to act for a party to a cause, it is his duty to furnish the opposite party's agent with his former client's address, if it is known to him, so as to enable that party to move the Court to proceed if further attendance is not made. Sime, Sullivan, and Dickson's Trustee v. Adam, Oct. 25, 1907, p. 32.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Agent's Rights—Hypothec—Company—Winding-up—Production of Documents—Reservation of Lien—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 115.

1. On the motion of the official liquidator of a company which was being wound up by the Court, the law-agents of the company were ordained to produce all books, title-deeds, papers, and other deeds or documents in their custody relating to the company "without prejudice to the lien claimed by them." Liquidator of Donaldson & Co., Limited, v. White & Park, Dec. 4, 1907, p. 309.
2. Where a law-agent, who has acted for a company, and is its creditor for professional services, in obedience to an order under sec. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, pronounced in the liquidation of the company, has produced the title-deeds of heritage belonging to the company, without prejudice to any lien which he may have over them, the mere reservation of his lien does not give him a preference over the general assets of the company, unless it can be shewn that, had the titles not been ordered to be delivered up, he would have had an effectual lien over them for his account. Rorie v. Stevenson, Feb. 8, 1908, p. 559.

3. Circumstances in which held that a law-agent was not entitled to a preferential ranking in the winding-up of a company. Rorie v. Stevenson, Feb. 8, 1908, p. 559.

See Agent and Principal—Expenses, 11, 12.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. Liability of Principal to third parties—Special Agency—Company Promotion—Agent employed for amalgamation of companies—Power to involve principal's credit for law-agent's account.

A company employed a chartered accountant to carry through an amalgamation of their company with another, and subsequently paid him £200 to cover his charges, expenses, and outlays. Without special instructions from the principals, and without their knowledge, he employed a firm of law-agents to prepare a certain deed, and informed them that it was on his principals' behalf. On his failing to pay the law-agents' account, they brought an action against the principals for the amount of that account. The defenders denied having employed the pursuers. Held that the agent had no authority from the defenders to employ the pursuers, and defenders assolined. J. M. & J. H. Robertson v. Beatson, M'Leod, & Co., Limited, June 6, 1908, p. 921.

1. Alimentary liferent out of money disentailed and settled on the disentailer as a condition of the consent of the next heir held to be settled by the next heir, and therefore not liable to arrestment by the disentailer's creditors. Lord Ruthven v. Drummond, July 14, 1908, p. 1154.

Liability to diligence—Alimentary Provision.

2. Question, whether an alimentary provision is adjudgeable. Cuthbert v. Cuthbert's Trustees, June 12, 1908, p. 967.

See Donation, 1.

ALIMENTARY PROVISION. Creation—Directions to purchase annuities—Right of beneficiary to payment of the capital—Government Annuities.

1. A testator directed his executor or his trustees to invest certain sums in the purchase of annuities in the name and for the benefit of certain persons. He further provided: "And I declare that all annuities . . . shall be purchased by him or them from the British Government or from the Scottish Widows' Insurance Company, Limited, of Edinburgh, in Scotland, and any other first-class company or annuity office as my said executor or . . . trustees shall in this behalf think fit." There was no declaration that the annuities were to be alimentary, but Government annuities, purchased under the Government Annuities Act, 1853, are not assignable except on the insolvency or bankruptcy of the annuitant. The beneficiaries having called on the trustees to pay over the principal sums instead of investing them in the purchase of annuities, held that the beneficiaries were entitled to payment of the principal sums. Turner's Trustees v. Fernie, May 30, 1908, p. 883.

Power to Assign.

2. Question as to the assignability of an alimentary provision quoad excessum. Cuthbert v. Cuthbert's Trustees, June 12, 1908, p. 967.

See Aliment.

APPROPRIATION OF PAYMENTS. See Accounting.

ARBITRATION. Submission—Construction.

1. A landlord and tenant entered into a submission, which, on the narrative that the tenant had in the lease become "bound to accept the buildings and others . . . as in good tenantable condition and repair when the same had been put into good order," referred to arbitration, inter alia, the sum payable by the landlord to the tenant in respect of any of the drains, ditches, dykes, and fences not being "in tenantable condition and repair" as at the entry of the tenant. The arbiters awarded a sum which they reached on the principle of giving the amount which an outgoing tenant would have had to expend in putting the subjects into tenantable condition and repair. In an action of reduction at the instance of the tenant against the landlord, held (1) that the question referred to arbitration was the amount of the defender's obligation qua landlord, and not the amount for which an outgoing tenant would have been liable, and therefore (2) that the arbiters not having determined the question submitted to them, their award fell to be reduced. Davidson v. Logan, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 350.

Powers and Duties of Arbitrator—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, sec. 5—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900, secs. 1 and 2 (1).

2. In an arbitration between a landlord and an outgoing tenant as to the amount of compensation for improvements to which the tenant was entitled, the tenant objected to the scale of compensation fixed by the lease at the commencement of his tenancy on the ground that it was not fair and reasonable, and claimed compensation on the scale fixed by the Act of 1883. Held that the arbitrator, in order to explicate his jurisdiction, was bound to decide whether the scale of compensation fixed by the lease was, at its date, fair and reasonable, and so fell to be applied. Observed that the decision of the arbitrator on this question would not be final, and might be challenged in a process of interdict or of reduction. Bell v. Graham, June 16, 1908, p. 1060.

Decree-Arbitral—Award by arbiters and oversman conjointly.

3. The landlord of a farm and the incoming tenant entered into a submission by which they referred certain questions "to A and B, arbiters mutually chosen, and in the case of their differing in opinion, to an oversman to be named by the said arbiters before entering on the business of the submission." An award was issued which bore to be the award of, and was signed by, the two arbiters and the oversman. In an action of reduction by the tenant against the landlord, held (1) that ex facie the award was invalid in respect that it bore to be the award of a tribunal to which the parties had not agreed to submit their disputes; and (2) that it was incompetent by parole evidence to prove that the oversman had never acted, and that the award was the award of the arbiters only. Davidson v. Logan, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 350.

See Master and Servant, 10, 17, 24.

ARRESTMENT. Arrestment on the dependence—Competency.

1. Arrestments on the dependence of an action against the purchasers of a ship completed but not finally handed over to the purchasers, recalled, in respect that the property had not passed. Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, v. Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited, Nov. 25, 1907 (H. L.), p. 1.

Subjects arrestable—Alimentary Fund—Settlement of disentailed money.

1. In a petition for disentail of an entailed sum of money presented by the heir in possession, the next heir consented to the disentail on condition that the balance of the disentailed sum, after satisfying certain debts of the disentailer, should be put in trust to provide an alimentary liferent to the disentailer. The value of the next heir's expectancy and certain debts due to him by the disentailer exceeded in amount the balance of the disentailed sum put in trust. Arrestments having been used by creditors of the disentailer in the hands of the trustees, held that in the circumstances the trust money had really been settled by the next heir, and not by the disentailer, and that consequently the alimentary restriction was valid; and arrestments recalled. Lord Ruthven v. Drummond, July 14, 1908, p. 1154.

Recall—Recall on ground that subjects not arrestable—Procedure—Competency—Competency of considering question of right in petition for recall.

3. Held that, where no action of furthcoming had been raised, the question whether a fund arrested was subject to the diligence of creditors could be determined in a petition for recall of the arrestments. Lord Ruthven v. Drummond, July 14, 1908, p. 1154.

Recall—Recall at instance of arrestee.

4. A petition for recall of arrestments at the instance of the arrestee is not competent (1) where the subject arrested is a debt or a sum due, or (2) where the subject arrested is a corporeal moveable which the arrestee admits is the property of the common debtor, but over which he alleges that he himself has claims; but such a petition is competent at the instance of the arrestee (3) where the subject arrested is a corporeal moveable which the arrestee does not admit is the property of the common debtor; and the arrestee will be entitled to have the arrestments recalled unless the arrester can establish a prima facie case that the subject arrested is the property of the common debtor. Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited, v. Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, Nov. 7, 1907, p. 82.

Recall—Procedure—Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 20.

5. Held that the expenses of an unsuccessful motion for recall of arrestments on the dependence could be dealt with as expenses in the action, such a motion not being a separate process. Muir & Co., Limited, v. United Collieries, Limited, March 17, 1908, p. 768.

Arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem—Validity—Arrestment of debt paid by cheque received before but cashed after arrestment.

6. A Glasgow firm brought an action in Scotland against Gray, an Englishman, after having used arrestments to found jurisdiction in the hands of a Scotch company, Moss, who were alleged to be due a sum of money to Gray. Gray had already received from Moss a cheque on a Glasgow bank for the amount due, which he indorsed for value prior to the arrestment. The cheque was not presented for payment by the indorsee till the day after the arrestment. It was then duly paid. Held that delivery of the cheque by Moss to Gray operated as instant payment of the sum due to him by Moss, that consequently, at the time when the arrestments were used, there was no fund in the hands of Moss which could be attached, and that jurisdiction had not been effectually constituted. Leggat Brothers v. Gray, Nov. 5, 1907, p. 67.
7. Observed that although an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem, after creating jurisdiction, leaves no nexus over the property arrested, yet such an arrestment to be effectual must be laid on property which would be arrestable in execution. Leggat Brothers v. Gray, Nov. 5, 1907, p. 67.

Arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem—Validity—Arrestment of Shares in Limited Company.

8. The shares of a limited company registered in Scotland are subject to arrestment, and the arrestment of such shares in the hands of the company ad fundandam jurisdictionem renders the shareholder liable to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session. American Mortgage Company of Scotland, Limited, v. Sidway, Jan. 31, 1908, p. 500.

ASSIGNATION. Alimentary Provision.

BANK. Cheque—Death of Drawer before presentment—Assignment of Funds in hands of Bank—Credit balance on current account—Debit balances on other accounts—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, secs. 53 (2), 73, 75.

1. A bank having refused payment of a cheque on the ground that it had received notice of the death of the drawer, the holder of the cheque in an action against the bank claimed payment of the amount on the ground that to that extent the cheque operated as an assignation of a sum standing at the drawer's credit on his account current in the hands of the bank. In a proof the bank books shewed a balance due to the drawer on his account current more than sufficient to pay the cheque, but they also shewed that on his other accounts the drawer was due to the bank for advances a larger sum than that standing at his credit on the current account. For these advances the bank held securities. Held (1) that the cheque, as a cheque, having lapsed at the death of the drawer, the pursuer could not avail himself of the rule by which a bank, which is in the habit of honouring a customer's cheques on a current account, is not entitled without notice to refuse payment because on a balance of all accounts the customer is a debtor to the bank; and (2) that the cheque did not operate as an assignation, in respect that at the time when it was presented to the defenders there were not in their hands any "funds available for the payment thereof" within the meaning of section 53 (2) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Kirkwood & Sons v. Clydesdale Bank, Oct. 15, 1907, p. 20.

Cheque—Payment—Arrestment of debt paid by cheque received before but cashed after arrestment.

2. Delivery of a cheque which was ultimately duly paid held to operate instant payment of a debt so as to leave no funds in the hands of the drawer due to the payee which could be arrested, although the arrestments were laid on before the cheque was presented for payment. Leggat Brothers v. Gray, Nov. 5, 1907, p. 67.

BANKRUPTCY. Constitution—Notour Bankruptcy—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 6.

1. Held that sec. 6 of the Debtors Act, 1880, applies to all cases where imprisonment is under that Act incompetent, even though it was already incompetent under a previous Act. Harvie v. Smith, Jan. 18, 1908, p. 474.

Trust for behoof of creditors—Trustee—Right of surviving trustee to act—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1861, sec. 1—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 1—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, secs. 1 and 2.

2. Held that the powers conferred on gratuitous trustees by the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1861, are extended to non-gratuitous trustees by the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884; and that, consequently, the survivor of two trustees, nominated in a trust-deed for behoof of creditors which contained no clause of survivorship, had a good title to pursue an action on behalf of the trust. Clark's Trustee v. McRostie, Nov. 22, 1907, p. 196.

Trustees—Liabilities—Liability to account to bankrupt—Trustee discharged—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, secs. 141 and 142.

3. A bankruptcy had been terminated on payment of a composition, and the trustee, after the statutory audit of his accounts by the commissioners, had been discharged. Thereafter the bankrupt brought an action of accounting under sec. 142 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, against the trustee, calling on him to account for his whole intromissions with the estate. Held that it was not competent to call on the trustee to account twice over for the same intromissions; and as there were no averments that the intromissions called in question had not already been adjudicated on by the commissioners, action dismissed as irrelevant. Opinion (per Lord Kinnear) that if a bankrupt desires to call on the trustee for an accounting under sec. 142 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, he must do so before the trustee has been discharged. Hemming v. Galbraith, June 6, 1908, p. 897.

Sequestration—Discharge of bankrupt—Failure to pay five shillings in the pound—Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 6 (1) and (3).

4. Where a bankrupt has not paid 5s. in the £1, the question whether his failure to do so has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible is a question in the discretion of the Judge of first instance, and although his judgment is subject to review the Court will not interfere unless there are no reasonable grounds on which the judgment can be supported. Bell v. Bell's Trustee, May 29, 1908, p. 853.
5. A bankrupt trader, more than two years after the date of his sequestration, applied for his discharge. Objections were lodged by the trustee in the sequestration and by the principal creditors of the bankrupt. The trustee reported that the bankruptcy was caused by the culpable conduct of the bankrupt. It appeared that the bankrupt was a cattle-dealer; that his business had been throughout a period of twelve years a series of speculations in the market price of live stock; that his bank-book shewed a turnover of £4000 a year; that at the end his liabilities were £1003 and his assets £156; that he had not kept proper business-books; and that he refused to assign to the trustee a spes successionis. No dividend was paid to the creditors, the assets recovered by the trustee, amounting to £156, having been lost by him in litigation. The objecting creditors were a limited company, carrying on business as auctioneers and live-stock salesmen, the trustee was their secretary, and the bankrupt's operations had been carried on mainly at their auction mart. The Sheriff-substitute found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, but suspended the granting of the discharge for three months. On appeal the Court affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. Bell v. Bell's Trustee, May 29, 1908, p. 853.

Sequestration—Procedure—Appeal—Competency—Election of Trustees—Finality of Sheriff's deliverance—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, secs. 68, 69, 71.

6. At a meeting of creditors convened for the purpose of electing a trustee on a bankrupt estate, and presided over by the Sheriff, an objection was stated to W., a candidate, in respect that he was a creditor, that his claim was founded on documents as to which questions must arise, and as to which he would have to adjudicate as trustee, and that accordingly he had an interest opposed to the general interest of the creditors. The objection was considered and repelled by the Sheriff, who, after a vote was taken, declared W. elected. In an appeal against the deliverance of the Sheriff on the ground that sec. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacted that "it all not be lawful to elect as trustee the bankrupt or any person conjunct or confident with the bankrupt, or who holds an interest opposed to the general interest of the creditors," that W. had such an interest, and that therefore the Sheriff's deliverance was ultra vires, Id that the objection in question was one for the consideration of the Sheriff, and that after he had considered and repelled it, his deliverance, under sec. 71 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, was final and not subject to review. Grierson v. Ogilvy's Trustee, June 11, 1908, p. 959.

A written agreement two parties stipulated that payment of certain goods, sold but not delivered, should be made by bills, which were to be guaranteed. Certain of the bills not having been met, the holders issued an action against the guarantors for payment of the balance. In defence a verbal agreement between the parties was alleged to the effect that the bills were to be renewed at maturity if the goods had not been delivered, and it was averred that delivery of all the goods had not been accepted. Held that the defence was irrelevant, in respect that the bills were granted in implement of the written agreement, and that, notwithstanding the provisions of sec. 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the terms of this agreement could not be modified by parole evidence. Stagg & Robson, Limited, v. Stirling, Feb. 28, 1908, p. 675.

I. Magistrates and Town-Council—Citation—Citation of Corporation by citing its members—Disclaimer of defence by certain members.

A corporation was cited by calling its members by name, as representing the corporation but not as individuals. The majority of the corporation resolved to defend the action. Held that they were entitled to lodge defences in name of the whole members as representing the corporation, and that dissenting members were not entitled to disclaim the defences. Eadie v. Glasgow Corporation, Nov. 21, 1907, p. 207.

in of Guild—Jurisdiction—Declinature of Jurisdiction—Disputed question of fact—Sist of cause to enable Court of Session action to be brought—Discretion of Dean of Guild.

A petition having been presented to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect certain buildings, answers were lodged thereto objecting that the proposed buildings were in contravention of certain building restrictions. No proper competition of heritable right was involved, but the matter depended on the construction of certain documents and on evidence as to the precise position of a plot "A" marked on a certain plan which had been lost. The Dean of Guild assisted the petition to enable the petitioner to establish his alleged rights in the Court of Session. Against this interlocutor the petitioner appealed, maintaining that the Dean of Guild should not have declined jurisdiction, but ought to consider and determine the matter himself. The Court held that, in the circumstances, it was not expedient to disturb the discretion of the Dean of Guild, and affirmed his interlocutor. Macandrew v. Dods, Oct. 31, 1907, p. 51.

in of Guild—Procedure—Appeal to Dean of Guild against decision of Corporation—Questions to be considered by Dean of Guild—Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, sec. 60.

Held that in disposing of an appeal under sec. 60 (3) of the Glasgow

BURGH—Continued.

Building Regulations Act, 1900, the Dean of Guild is not limited to the consideration of whether the Corporation in giving their consent were acting capriciously or ultra vires, but must also take into consideration whether the individual owner appealing is, as a result of his proximity, unduly prejudiced by the increased height; and that the Dean of Guild should not take into consideration the invasion of any legal rights of the individual owner, such legal rights falling to be vindicated in the petition for lining. Observed that in disposing of such an appeal the Dean of Guild ought to apply his expert knowledge, and, where possible, dispose of the matter summarily without a proof. Summerlee Iron Co., Limited, v. Lindsay, March 13, 1908, p. 754.

Common Good—Accounts—Objection to accounts—Time for lodging objections—Royal Burghs (Scotland) Act, 1822, secs. 1, 3, and 10—Royal Burghs (Scotland) Act, 1833, sec. 32—Glasgow Municipal Act, 1879, sec. 10.

4. The Glasgow Municipal Act, 1879, altered the date for making up the accounts for Glasgow from 15th October, as provided by sec. 32 of the Royal Burghs Act, 1833, to 31st May.

On 7th May 1907, within the time allowed for objections by the Royal Burghs Act of 1822, certain burgesses of Glasgow, by a letter addressed to the Town-clerk, objected to an item charged in the Common Good account for the year ending 31st May 1906, and on 7th June 1907 presented a petition and complaint praying the Court to disallow the charge. The Corporation of Glasgow, besides answers on the merits, maintained that the objections were too late, contending that the alterations made on the date for lodging the annual account involved a corresponding change in the date for objecting to the account. Held that the statutory provisions in the Act of 1822 as to lodging objections to the annual account were not affected by the alteration of the date for making up and lodging the account. Eadie v. Glasgow Corporation, Nov. 21, 1907, p. 207.

1. Under a contract for the construction of water-works for a town-council undertaken by M'Donald, Marshall and Pennycook were taken bound, jointly and severally, as cautioners for the due performance of the contract. On 24th May 1904 the town-council intimated to the cautioners that if the work was not carried on satisfactorily within eight days the contract would be taken off M'Donald's hands, and the cautioners would be held liable for any loss. The work was thereafter carried on satisfactorily till 13th July when M'Donald became incapacitated by ill-health from continuing the contract, whereupon Marshall, who was himself a builder and contractor, after asking and being refused the co-operation of Pennycook, with consent of the town-council, but without any further formal demand by them upon him, took up the contract as cautioner and completed it. The result was that there was never any failure to carry it on regularly. In completing the contract Marshall sustained loss. It was proved that if he had not acted as he did the loss would have been greater. Held that in these circumstances Marshall was entitled to intervene personally at the time when he did so, and that Pennycook was bound to pay to him one-half of the loss sustained by him, including half of a fee to him for superintending the work. Marshall & Co. v. Pennycook, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 276.

2. By a contract for the construction of water-works for a town-council it was stipulated that payments should be made to the contractor monthly on certificates of the engineer at the rate of 80 per cent of the value of the work executed, the remaining 20 per cent being payable half on completion of the work, and the balance at a later period, the town-council "always having power to withhold payment on any certificate should the works not be carried on regularly or to their satisfaction." The contractor became incapacitated by ill-health from completing the contract. A sum of £400 was then certified as payable to the contractor by the town-council. One of two cautioners for the contractor intervened and completed the contract, with the effect that there was never any failure to carry it on regularly. The town-council, after the cautioner had intervened, with his consent but not with consent of the other cautioner, paid away the £400 to assignees of the contractor. Held that as the works had been carried on regularly the council would not have been entitled under the contract to withhold payment of the £400, and that by paying it over they did not free the non-consenting cautioner from his obligation. Observed that the cautioners would have been freed if the town-council had paid over the 20 per cent before the time stipulated. Marshall & Co. v. Pennycook, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 276.

CHARITABLE AND EDUCATIONAL BEQUESTS AND TRUSTS. Constitution—Construction—Uncertainty.

1. A testator by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to employ the residue of his estate "in instituting and carrying on a scheme for the relief of indigent bachelors and widowers, of whatever religious denomination or belief they may be, who have shown practical sympathy, either as amateurs or professionals, in the pursuits of science in any of its branches, whose lives have been characterised by sobriety, morality, and industry, and who are not less than fifty-five years of age, or of aiding any scheme which now exists or may be instituted by others for that purpose." Held (1) that the bequest was "charitable," and therefore entitled to a benignant construction; and (2) that so construed it was not void from uncertainty. Weir v. Crum Brown, Feb. 6, 1908, (H. L.) p. 3.
2. A testator disposed his whole estate to certain trustees, and directed them to realise the whole residue of his estate at such time as they might think proper, and "at any time or times, or from time to time, as and when the said residue or any part thereof becomes available, as they may deem proper, to pay over or divide the said residue, or any part or parts thereof, to or amongst such local or Scottish charitable institutions and schemes already constituted, or which may hereafter be constituted . . . as they may select, or any one or more of such institutions and schemes, and that at such time, in such manner, or in such proportions, all as they in their absolute discretion may deem proper." The testator further provided that his trustees should have "the fullest powers of and in regard to realisation, investment, administration, management, and division, as if they were beneficial owners"; that "the time, manner, and propriety of selling and disposing" of his estate, heritable and moveable, should be entirely at the discretion of his trustees; and that his trustees might, should they in their discretion see fit, retain the investments of which the estate consisted at the time of his death, "and that for such time or times as they might think fit or indefinitely." The next of kin of the testator maintained that the directions of the trust-disposition with regard to the disposition of the residue were void from uncertainty, in respect that (1) the class of objects of the testator's bounty was not sufficiently definite; and (2) power was given to the trustees to postpone realisation indefinitely. Held that the bequest of residue was not void from uncertainty. Dick v. Audsley, May 26, 1908, (H. L.) p. 27.

3. A Scottish testator, by his holograph general settlement, provided,—
“The residue of my property I give and bequeath for the benefit of foreign missions in India, China, Africa, and South America, or any other in the foreign field suitable. I appoint the Rev. W. Watson, Kiltearn, as my executor, at a remuneration of £20 sterling.” Held that the bequest was a bequest for charitable purposes, and was not void from uncertainty, the bequest being to a definite class, coupled with the appointment of a person (the executor) having power to select the objects falling within the class on whom the benefit of the bequest was to be conferred. Allan's Executor v. Allan, March 17, 1908, p. 807.
4. A testatrix directed her trustee or trustees to apportion and pay over the proceeds of the residue of her estate “amongst such societies or institutions of a benevolent or charitable nature in such proportions as he or they shall in their own discretion think proper.” Held that the bequest was to be construed as a bequest in favour of charitable societies and institutions, and was not void from uncertainty. Hay's Trustees v. Baillie, July 18, 1908, p. 1224.

Administration—Bequest for “the poor of the parish.”

5. Held that a bequest to the Parish Council of K. “for the benefit of the poor of the parish of K.” was not limited in its application to the “legal poor,” but might be applied for the benefit of poor persons who were not in receipt of parochial relief. Parish Council of Kinloes v. Morgan, Nov. 22, 1907, p. 192.

Alteration of Scheme—Bursary for natives of a town—Extension to those born elsewhere.

6. A testator bequeathed a sum of money to trustees for the purpose of founding a bursary to be granted by them “to any deserving young man, being a native of Dunbar, attending college in the prospect of becoming a minister of the Established Church of Scotland, or as a missionary.” The trustees received payment of the bequest in 1888. In 1907 they presented a petition in which they stated that, although full publicity had been given to the bursary by advertisement and by intimation in the local schools, no application for it had ever been made, and craved the Court to empower them, failing application from natives of Dunbar, to grant the bursary to otherwise qualified applicants born in the Presbytery of Dunbar, or failing such applicants to otherwise qualified applicants without conditions as to nativity. The Court granted the petition. Kirk-Session of Dunbar, May 29, 1908, p. 852.

Cy-près—Failure of purpose—Grant of additional powers—No formal scheme.

7. The administrator of a charitable trust, founded in 1786 for the purpose of supplying to poor householders in Edinburgh oatmeal, or oats to be made into meal, at 10d. per peck (which was approximately half the market price in 1908), presented a petition to the Court in which, on the narrative that for many years it had been impossible to expend the whole income of the trust on the trust purposes, he craved for a grant of additional powers. Circumstances in which the Court, without formally approving of a scheme, granted additional powers to enable the administrator to supply coal, milk, oatcakes, bread, or flour, at half the market price. Guardian of Thomson's Mortification, July 4, 1908, p. 1078.

COMPANY. Summary Complaint at instance of Company.

1. A summary complaint may be presented at the instance of an incorporated company without the conjunction of an officer of the company. Fairbairn v. Lochryan Oyster Fishery Co., Limited, May 31, 1907, (J.) p. 1.

Liability ex delicto—Slander uttered by servant.

2. Held that a company was liable for a verbal slander uttered by its servant in the course of the servant's employment and for the benefit of the company. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, June 9, 1908, p. 928.

Incorporation—Validity—Trade Union—Trade Union Act, 1871, sec. 5—Trade Union Amendment Act, 1876, sec. 16.

3. The Aberdeen Master Masons' Incorporation, Limited, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, and the memorandum of association provided that the objects of the Incorporation, inter alia, were "(1) to take over the whole or any of the assets and liabilities of the unincorporated association known as 'The Aberdeen Master Masons' Association'"; (13) to assist any institution with objects similar to those of the trade, "and not being a trade union"; (22) to do all lawful things conducive to the attainment of the above objects, "provided that the Incorporation shall not impose on its members or support with its funds any regulation which, if an object of the Incorporation, would make it a trade union." An action having been raised by the Incorporation against a member for payment of dues, the defender averred that the association, whose assets and liabilities were taken over by the pursuers, was a trade union, and that the pursuers were de facto acting as a trade union, and pleaded that the pursuers, being a trade union, were not validly registered as a company, and had no title to sue. Held that as any act which would make the Incorporation a trade union would be null and void under the above quoted clauses of the memorandum of association, the Incorporation could not be a trade union, and plea of "no title to sue" repelled. Aberdeen Master Masons' Incorporation, Limited, v. Smith, Feb. 27, 1908, p. 669.

Memorandum—Inconsistency between Memorandum and Articles of Association—Provisions in the Articles for preferential treatment of one class of shareholders.

4. The memorandum of association of a limited company provided:—"The capital of the company is £250,000, divided into 139,092 ordinary shares of £1 each, and 110,908 deferred shares of £1 each." The articles of association provided that the ordinary shares should have a preferential ranking as to dividend; and that, in the event of a winding-up, the shares of the company should be repaid "in the order in which the shares or stocks are entitled to rank for payment of dividend." In the winding-up of the company the deferred shareholders maintained that the provision in the articles for the preferential ranking of the ordinary shareholders in a winding-up was inconsistent with the memorandum of association, and was therefore invalid; and that the surplus assets fell to be distributed equally among all the shareholders. Held that there was no inconsistency between the articles and the memorandum of association, and that in the winding-up the ordinary shareholders were entitled to payment of their capital in full before the deferred shareholders received anything on account of their capital. Liquidator of the Humboldt Redwood Co., Limited, v. Coats, March 13, 1908, p. 751.

COMPANY—Continued.

Members and their liability—Membership—Qualifications—Objections to admission pleadable by company and not by member—Liability for dues.

5. At a meeting, on 8th July 1904, of the directors of the Aberdeen Master Masons' Incorporation, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Act, S. was admitted as a member of the Incorporation. On account of his age, and for other reasons, S. was, in accordance with the articles of association, ineligible for membership, but he accepted membership, and acted as a member till 20th March 1906, when he sent in a letter of resignation. On 4th June 1906 the Incorporation raised an action against S. for payment of dues incurred by him prior to the date of his resignation. S. pleaded that he never was a member of the Incorporation, and had consequently never incurred the dues. Held that the defender was liable for the sum sued for on the ground that he was a member of the Incorporation, the objections to his admission being pleadable by the Company and by no one else; Lord Kinnear also holding that whether he was technically a member or not, he was bound by his agreement with the Incorporation. Aberdeen Master Masons' Incorporation, Limited, v. Smith, Feb. 27, 1908, p. 669.

Members and their Liability—Agreement to take Shares—Illegal issue of Shares—Condition of setting off calls against fees to be earned.

6. A applied for shares in a company, and paid the amount due on application, on the express condition that the firm of which he was a member should be appointed to a certain office, and that he should be at liberty to pay up the balance due upon his shares by fees to be earned by the firm. Before the balance had been paid the company went into liquidation. The company and its liquidator sued A for the amount unpaid upon his shares. Held that it was ultra vires of the directors to agree to the stipulation as to payment for the shares, and therefore that the defender was not a shareholder and was entitled to absolver. National House Property Investment Co., Limited, v. Watson, June 5, 1908, p. 888.

Members and their Liability—Agreement to take Shares—Conditional Application.

7. A applied for shares in a company, his letter of application containing the following condition:—"This application is made on the distinct understanding . . . that my firm is appointed surveyors to this company over an average radius of thirty miles from Edinburgh . . . and that my firm is also appointed advisory surveyors to the Advisory Board for Scotland at fees to be adjusted." He paid the amount due on application. His firm obtained the appointment as surveyors for the Edinburgh district, but were never made advisory surveyors to the Board for Scotland, the company having gone into liquidation before that Board was constituted. Opinions that the application was one for an immediate allotment of shares provided the company agreed to the conditions specified, and that the condition as to the advisory surveyorship was not a condition precedent but subsequent and collateral to the contract, and meant that A's firm should obtain the appointment when the Board was constituted. National House Property Investment Co., Limited, v. Watson, June 5, 1908, p. 888.

Capital—Reduction of Capital—Conversion without Reduction of Capital—Companies Act, 1867, secs. 9-19—Companies Act, 1877, secs. 3 and 4.

8. A limited liability company under its memorandum of association had a capital of £50,000, divided into 50,000 shares of £1 each, with power to reduce its capital. All its shares had been issued, 12s. 6d. being paid up on each share. The shareholders unanimously passed and confirmed a special resolution that the capital of the company should be converted from 50,000 shares of £1 each, with 12s. 6d. paid up, into 50,000 shares of £1 each, with the full amount paid up on 31,250, leaving 18,750 to be issued at the discretion of the directors; and that such conversion should be effected by re-allocating the share capital among the shareholders, crediting to each of them one £1 share for each pound sterling at his credit in the share capital account. The company presented a petition for confirmation of the "reduction of capital resolved on by" the special resolution above mentioned. All the creditors of the company consented. The Court refused to confirm the resolution in respect that it effected a "conversion" and "re-allocation," and not a reduction of capital. Walker Steam Trawl Fishing Co., Limited, Nov. 16, 1907, p. 123.

Directors—Directors' Remuneration—Directors' Expenses—Expenses of travelling to and from Board Meetings.

9. The articles of association of a limited company, after providing for the remuneration of the directors, further provided that the directors "shall be indemnified out of the funds of the company against all costs, charges, losses, damages, and expenses which they shall respectively incur and be put to in the execution of their respective offices." In an action at the instance of the company against a director for repayment of sums paid to him as his expenses in travelling from his home in Scotland to attend the meetings of the board in London, held that these expenses were not incurred by the director in the execution of his office, and that consequently the payments made to him were illegal and fell to be refunded. Marmor, Limited, v. Alexander, Nov. 7, 1907, p. 78.

Winding-up—By the Court—Petition by creditors—Withdrawal of petitioning creditors—Sist of other creditors in their place—Competency.

10. Creditors, who had presented a petition for the compulsory winding-up of a limited company, after intimation and service had been effected, but before the prayer of the petition had been granted, compromised their claim against the company, and did not insist in the petition. Certain other creditors of the company thereupon presented a note stating that they desired to insist in the petition, and craving the Court to sist them as petitioners in place of the original petitioners. The company lodged answers, in which they challenged the competency of the application. The Court sisted the applicants as craved. The Tudor Accumulator Co., Limited, v. Scott Stirling & Co., Limited, Dec. 18, 1907, p. 331.

Winding-up—Liquidator—Joint Liquidators—Small Company.

11. In the voluntary winding-up of a company with a nominal capital of £5000, and a paid-up capital of £42, 4s., A was appointed liquidator. In a petition by a creditor for a supervision order, the company and the creditors concurred in asking the Court to grant the order, and to appoint B joint liquidator. The Court granted the order, but in respect of the smallness of the sum involved refused to appoint a joint liquidator, superseded A as liquidator, and appointed C sole liquidator. Wishart, March 4, 1908, p. 690.

Winding-up—Liquidator—Director resident in London.

12. Circumstances in which the Court appointed as joint liquidator in the winding-up of a company a person who was a director of the company, and who was resident in London. Liquidators of Bruce Peebles & Co., Limited, v. Shiells, March 5, 1908, p. 692.

Winding-up—Conduct of Liquidation—Production of Documents—Lien—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 115.

in their custody relating to the company "without prejudice to the lien claimed by them." Liquidator of Donaldson & Co., Limited, v. White & Park, Dec. 4, 1907, p. 309.

14. Where a law-agent, who has acted for a company, and is its creditor for professional services, in obedience to an order under sec. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, pronounced in the liquidation of the company, has produced the title-deeds of heritage belonging to the company, without prejudice to any lien which he may have over them, the mere reservation of his lien does not give him a preference over the general assets of the company, unless it can be shewn that, had the titles not been ordered to be delivered up, he would have had an effectual lien over them for his account. Rorie v. Stevenson, Feb. 8, 1908, p. 559.
15. Circumstances in which held that a law-agent was not entitled to a preferential ranking in the winding-up of a company. Rorie v. Stevenson, Feb. 8, 1908, p. 559.

Winding-up—Expenses—Petitioning Creditor's Expenses—Party and Party or Agent and Client—"Expenses as taxed."

16. In a petition at the instance of a creditor for the compulsory winding-up of a limited company, answers were lodged by the company, together with a note stating that the shareholders had resolved upon a voluntary winding-up, and had appointed a liquidator, and asking that the liquidation be continued under the supervision of the Court. The Court refused the petition for compulsory winding-up, pronounced a supervision order, and found the petitioner and the respondents entitled "to their expenses as these may be taxed by the Auditor." Held, on the motion for approval of the Auditor's report, that under the above finding the petitioning creditor was entitled to have his expenses taxed as between agent and client. M'Gregor v. Ballachulish Slate Quarries Co., Limited, Oct. 16, 1907, p. 1.

Winding-up—Expenses—Petitioning creditor's expenses—Creditor's petition for judicial winding-up—Supervision order pronounced on company's petition—Creditor's expenses.

17. One of the creditors of a company presented a petition for the judicial winding-up of the company. Thereafter the company, having passed an extraordinary resolution for voluntary winding-up and having appointed D. as liquidator, petitioned for a supervision order, and lodged answers to the creditor's petition. The creditor also lodged answers to the company's petition. At the hearing the parties agreed that a supervision order should be pronounced, but the creditor moved that D. should be superseded as liquidator. The Court pronounced a supervision order in the company's petition and continued D. as liquidator. The creditor moved that his expenses in his petition for judicial winding-up should be expenses in the liquidation. The company opposed. The Court held that the creditor's expenses prior to the date of the petition for a supervision order were expenses in the liquidation, and quoad ultra refused the motion. Pattullo v. Caithness Flagstone Co., Limited (in Liquidation), Oct. 22, 1907, p. 25.

Winding-up—Expenses—Petition for leave to proceed with an action against Company—Unsuccessful opposition by Liquidator and Company—Decree for "expenses"—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 87.

18. A note was presented in the compulsory winding-up of a company, praying for leave, under sec. 87 of the Companies Act, 1862, to proceed with an action against the Company, and to find the Company and liquidator, if they or either should appear to oppose the prayer, liable in expenses. The note was opposed by the Company and its liquidator. The Court authorised the petitioners to proceed with their action, and found them entitled to "expenses." The Auditor having disallowed the expenses incurred by the petitioners prior to the date of lodging answers by the Company and its liquidator, the petitioners lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report. The Court sustained the objection, holding that as the petitioners had been found entitled to "expenses" without limitation, it was too late for the Company and its liquidator to raise the question of liability for expenses incurred by the petitioners prior to the date of lodging answers. Observed that the Company and liquidator by appearing incurred the risk of being held liable for the prior expenses. Anderson's Trustees v. Donaldson & Co., Limited (in Liquidation), Jan. 8, 1908, p. 385.

Winding-up—Expenses—Petitioning Creditor's Expenses.

19. The Court intimated that they would not in future grant expenses to petitioners as a matter of course, but would leave it for the decision of the Lord Ordinary to whom the liquidation was remitted. Observations on the expenses in liquidation proceedings. Wishart, March 4, 1908, p. 690.

Restraint of actions and diligence—Action by superior for sequestration for feu-duty after Liquidation—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 163.

20. Held that an action by a superior against his vassal, a limited company in liquidation, for sequestration of the moveables on the feu for arrears of feu-duty, was not an "attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution" within the meaning of sec. 163 of the Companies Act, 1862, in respect that it was not a proceeding for the purpose of creating a security, but was a proceeding for the purpose of making effectual a real security already existing in virtue of the superior's infestment. *Anderson's Trustees v. 1. Telford falsely represented to Morrison that he was the son of Wilson, Bonnyrigg, and had authority from him to purchase two cows. Morrison was deceived by this representation, agreed to sell the cows on the usual credit, and delivered them to Telford, who never paid the price. Thereafter Robertson purchased the cows from Telford in good faith and without knowing that they had been improperly obtained, and paid the price demanded by Telford. In an action by Morrison against Robertson for delivery of the cows, held (1) that the cows were never sold to Telford, and (2) that the purchaser from him had no title to retain them. *Morrison v. having left Mulvein's employment, Mulvein, founding on the agreement, brought an action to have Murray interdicted from selling boots and shoes to or canvassing any persons who were customers of the pursuer prior to the date when the defender left the pursuer's employment, and from selling, travelling for, or trading in, boots and shoes in certain districts specified. The defender pleaded that the agreement founded on was illegal, in respect that it was in restraint of trade, and was more comprehensive than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the pursuer's interests. From a proof it appeared that the districts specified in the prayer of the petition were the districts in which the defender had travelled when in the pursuer's employment, and further that the pursuer did business in several other parts of Scotland. Held that the obligation not to sell to or canvass the pursuer's customers for a period of twelve months from the termination of the agreement was reasonable and valid. Held further, that quoad ultra the obligation was unreasonable and invalid, both because the area within which it took the defender bound not to travel was unnecessarily wide, and also because it took him bound not to travel in any trade whatsoever. Mulvein v. Murray, Jan. 31, 1908, p. 528.

1. In 1906 a labourer raised an action against his wife's brother for decree for payment of £26, as being the amount expended by the pursuer on the defender's aliment. The pursuer averred that in 1897 he took the defender, then a destitute orphan eleven years old, into his own house, and alimented him for two years, after which the defender was able to earn enough for his own support. Held that the action was irrelevant, the pursuer's averments shewing that the aliment had been given as a donation, and without any intention that it should form a debt against the defender. Turnbull v. Brien, Dec. 5, 1907, p. 313.

2. On 24th December 1903 the books of Robert Brownlee junior contained an account-current between him and his father, Robert Brownlee senior, which shewed a balance of £1653, 8s. 6d. at the credit of the father. At the same date the account was squared by an entry of "To cash, £1653, 8s. 6d.," and a docquet was appended, which was signed by Robert Brownlee senior, in these terms—"Settled this date." Of the same date a receipt was granted by the father to the son for £1653, 8s. 6d. "as per account rendered." No cash passed between the parties. At the same date the son gave a receipt to his sister, Miss Brownlee, for £1653, 8s. 6d., and she was credited in his books with that amount. On 22d February 1904 Robert Brownlee junior gave his father a written guarantee that Miss Brownlee would pay him £2000. On 16th March 1904 Robert Brownlee junior, by Miss Brownlee's instructions, paid the £1653 and interest to the father's agents. In an action brought by the father's executrix in 1905 against Robert Brownlee junior for payment of the £2000, the question arose whether in March 1904 the sum of £1653, 8s. 6d. belonged to the father or to the daughter. The defender alleged that it had been gifted by the father to the daughter on 24th December 1903, and contended that the documents above mentioned instructed an absolute title in the daughter, and, therefore, that the £1653 had been paid by the daughter, and the defender's liability under the guarantee reduced by that amount. Held that as the defender admitted that the sum due by him to his father had not been paid by him to his father on 24th December 1903, the onus lay upon him to prove (1) that the father had transferred the title to Miss Brownlee, and (2) that he had done so animus donandi; and that the writings did not, by themselves or along with the parole evidence, instruct either the transfer to her or the animus donandi. Brownlee's Executrix v. Brownlee, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 232.

ELECTION LAW. Burgh Occupation Franchise—Tenant and Occupant—Joint Tenants—Valuation-Roll—Occupancy—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832, secs. 11 and 12.

1. A and B and three other persons were, at a rent of £45, joint tenants under a lease of premises in a burgh which were used as billiard and reading rooms by an organisation (consisting of about 100 persons) of which they were members. During the currency of the year ending 31st July 1907 B ceased to be a member of the organisation and his name was deleted from the Valuation-roll. A having been put on the roll of burgh voters as joint tenant and joint occupant of the premises, on the ground that the rent of the premises was sufficient to afford a £10 qualification to him and to each of the other three remaining occupants, the Court in an appeal held that A's name fell to be deleted from the roll, on the ground that as B still remained a joint tenant under the lease A's interest was under £10. Question, per Lord Johnston, whether the four persons occupied the premises as joint tenants or merely as members of the organisation, sharing the occupancy with the other hundred members. Niven v. Stewart, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 290.

University Franchise—Right of women graduates to vote—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, secs. 27 and 28—Universities Elections Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 2 (3), (10), and (16)—Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 14 (6).

2. Women graduates of a Scottish university are not entitled to vote in the election of a Member of Parliament for the university. Nairn v. University Courts of St Andrews and Edinburgh, Nov. 16, 1907, p. 113.
3. The registrar of a Scottish University is not bound to issue voting papers to women graduates although their names appear on the register of the general council of the university. Nairn v. University Courts of St Andrews and Edinburgh, Nov. 16, 1907, p. 113.

ENTAIL.

1. Effect—Acquisition of Bond over Entailed Lands by Heir of Entail in Possession—Confusio—Defective Entail—Bond held not extinguished confusione. Colville's Trustees v. Marindin, June 6, 1908, p. 911.

Heir in possession—Lease—Obligation to take over sheep stock—Transmission of obligation against succeeding heir of entail.

2. In an action brought by the tenant of a sheep farm on an entailed estate in Argyllshire, on the death of his landlord, against the next heir of entail, for declarator that the landlord's obligation in the lease to purchase the tenant's stock of sheep at its termination was binding on the defender, the pursuer averred that from time immemorial such obligations had been a universal condition of sheep farm leases in the north and west of Scotland, founded on the considerations (1) that sheep stock in that part of the country requires to be acclimatised to a particular farm or district, and (2) that stock habituated to a certain holding do not wander beyond the boundaries, and thus enable march fences to be dispensed with. Held that although the lease was an alienation struck at by the fetters, it was valid as a necessary act of administration, binding on the estate, but that the obligation to purchase the sheep was a personal obligation, which did not burden the estate, and was not binding on the next heir of entail. Gillespie v. Riddell, Feb. 20, 1908, p. 628.

Heir in possession—Lease—Obligation to take over sheep stock—Transmission of obligation against representatives of lessor.

3. An heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate granted a lease of a sheep farm which contained this clause:—"The proprietor binds and obliges himself that he or the then incoming tenant shall purchase the waygoing blackfaced hill sheep stock . . . at the expiration of this tenancy . . . at the valuation of two arbiters mutually chosen." The grantor of the lease died and was succeeded in the entailed estate by the next heir of entail, who disentailed and died before the termination of the lease. The lease being about to terminate, his representatives and the incoming tenant both intimated to the outgoing tenant that they declined to purchase the sheep stock. The tenant then sought to enforce the obligation against the trustees and executors of the grantor of the lease by presenting a petition against them for the appointment of an arbiter to value the sheep stock. Held that the obligation had transmitted against the trustees and executors of the grantor, and that they were bound to appoint an arbiter. Gardiners v. Stewart's Trustees, June, 16, 1908, p. 985.

Disentail—Consents—Date of Entail—Trust to entail lands—Failure of trustees to carry out trust—Lands in Scotland subsequently entailed in terms of the trust—Option to settle lands either in England or Scotland—Entail Amendment Act, 1848, secs. 2, 27, 28.

4. By his testamentary writings a testator bequeathed £150,000 to certain trustees for the purpose of purchasing lands in England or Scotland, and settling them on a certain series of heirs in such terms as would have imported, with regard to lands in Scotland, a strict entail. The testator died in 1840, and the trustees never accepted office or took any steps to carry out the purposes of the trust. In 1866 the general representative of the testator executed a disposition and deed of entail of a Scotch estate that he had purchased at a price exceeding £150,000. The disposition and deed of entail proceeded on the narrative of the trust created by the testator, was in favour of the series of heirs specified therein, and declared that the present deed was executed in fulfilment of that trust. In 1907 the heir of entail in possession of the estate, who was born in 1864, presented a petition to disentail, in which he claimed the right to do so without the consent of the next heir, on the ground that the date of the entail must be taken to be the date of the coming into operation of the trust, viz., the testator's death in 1840. Held (1) that the entail was an entail in execution of the trust; (2) that although there was an option to settle lands either in England or Scotland, the lands actually settled being lands in Scotland, the provisions of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, were applicable; (3) that in virtue of sec. 28 of that Act the date of the entail must be taken to be the date of the testator's death, and therefore, in virtue of sec. 2 of the Act, the petitioner was entitled to disentail without consents; and (4) that no distinction could be drawn with regard to the portion of the estate that was said to exceed £150,000 in value. Earl of Mansfield v. Lord Scone's Tutor, Jan. 18, 1908, p. 459.
5. Disentail—Consent—Condition of consent—Settlement of disentailed money to provide alimentary liferent for disentailer—Money held to be settled by next heir, and alimentary restriction consequently valid. Lord Ruthven v. Drummond, July 14, 1908, p. 1154.

no material alteration had been made on a draft revised by him. F. subsequently refused to implement the contract on the ground that a material alteration had been made in one of the clauses, of which he had not been made aware. S. brought an action of damages against F. for breach of contract. After a proof, held (1) that when F. signed the deed he was under no error as to its nature, (2) that his error as to one of the clauses was not induced by S., and (3) that accordingly F. was bound by his signature. *Selkirk v. EXPENSES. Awarding—Jury Trial—Verdict under £50—Limitation of Expenses recoverable by pursuer.

1. Held that in a case originating in the Sheriff Court the limitation, enacted by sec. 8 of the Act of Sederunt 20th March 1907, as to the amount of expenses recoverable by the pursuer, applies only to expenses in the Court of Session, and not to expenses in the Sheriff Court. Geddes v. A. & J. M'Lellan, June 10, 1908, p. 941.

Awarding—Jury Trial—Verdict under £50—Certificate by Judge—Time to apply for certificate.

2. Observed, per curiam, that the certificate entitling a pursuer to recover a proportion of his expenses larger than one-half ought to be applied for either at the trial or within eight days thereafter. Geddes v. A. & J. M'Lellan, June 10, 1908, p. 941.

Awarding—Administrative Proceeding—Petition to designate land for burial ground—Power to award expenses against unsuccessful objector—Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855.

3. A parish council presented a petition to the Sheriff, under the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, praying him to designate certain lands as a burial ground. Objections were lodged by a conterminous proprietor, whose lands were separated from the proposed burial ground by a burn, on the ground that the burn would be polluted by the drainage from the burial ground. The Sheriff repelled the objections, designated the ground, and awarded expenses against the objector. The objector, being charged for the expenses, brought a suspension of the charge, on the ground that the award of expenses was ultra vires of the Sheriff. Held that the proceedings were administrative and not judicial, and that, the objections not being vexatious, the Sheriff was not entitled to award expenses against the objector; and charge suspended. Liddall v. Ballingry Parish Council, July 4, 1908, p. 1082.

Awarding—Particular Processes—Petition for limitation of liability of ship—Expenses of competition—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, secs. 503 and 504.

6. In a petition at the instance of shipowners for limitation of liability under secs. 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, observed (per the Lord President),—"Where no question is raised as to the right of petitioners to have their liability limited, and where the ship, as it were, tables its stake, then such expenses as are given against the petitioners over and above the limited fund must be restricted to the expenses of lodging the claims and taking decree, and not extended to any expenses incurred in the competition between the claimants." Kennedys v. Clyde Shipping Co., Limited, June 5, 1908, p. 895.

Awarding—Particular Processes—Stated Case—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Expenses of adjusting stated case.

7. Where the appellant in a stated case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, had been allowed the expenses of the stated case, the Court, following the practice adopted in the case of London and Edinburgh Shipping Co. v. Brown, 1905, 7 F. 488, modified the expenses to be allowed for adjusting the stated case at the sum of £3, 3s., including the fee of £1 paid to the Sheriff-clerk. Dempster v. Baird & Co., Limited, March 7, 1908, p. 722.

Interlocutors dealing with expenses—Expenses of first trial—Motion for new trial.

8. The pursuer of an action of damages obtained a verdict, which was set aside as being contrary to the evidence, and a new trial was ordered. At the second trial the pursuer again obtained a verdict. The defenders moved for a new trial. The Court refused to allow a new trial, and found the pursuer entitled to expenses "except the expenses of the first trial." Held that the expenses incurred by the pursuer in resisting the motion to set aside the verdict obtained at the first trial were expenses of the first trial, and consequently that the pursuer was not entitled to these expenses. Conolly v. North British Railway Co., Jan. 15, 1908, p. 422.

Parties liable and entitled—Trustees unsuccessfully defending action to reduce trust-deed—Party and Party or Agent and Client.

9. Circumstances in which a body of testamentary trustees—who had unsuccessfully defended an action for reduction of the trust-deed, and had, along with the trust-estate, been found liable in expenses—were allowed expenses out of the trust-estate, to be taxed as between agent and client; but not the expenses of an unsuccessful motion for a new trial. Merrilees v. Leckie's Trustees, Feb. 19, 1908, p. 576.

Taxation—Party and Party or Agent and Client—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, sec. 3—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, sec. 166.

10. Held that, in virtue of sec. 3 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, that Act does not apply to an action against a Local Authority for an act done in pursuance of the Public Health Act, 1897. Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. Haddington Corporation, Nov. 12, 1907, p. 127.

Decree in agent's name—Compensation.

11. In an action for payment of a sum claimed as due under a contract the defenders pleaded no title to sue, and also that the matters in dispute fell to be determined by arbitration. After a proof the Lord Ordinary repelled the plea of no title to sue, found the pursuers entit' to expenses, and remitted the account to the Auditor. Thereafter the Lord Ordinary sustained the plea that the matters in dispute fell to be determined by arbitration, and sisted the process, reserving the question of expenses. The pursuers thereafter moved for approval of the Auditor's report on their account of expenses, and for decree in name of the agents-disbursers. The defenders maintained that to grant decree as craved would prevent them setting off a claim for expenses if they should be found entitled to expenses when the merits of the action were decided. The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) superseded consideration of the pursuers' motion, and granted leave to reclaim. The pursuers having reclaimed, the Court granted decree in name of the agents-disbursers. Opinions that the course taken by the Lord Ordinary was competent. Hugh Nelson & Co. v. Glasgow Corporation, May 30, 1908, p. 879.

Decree in agent's name—Objections not stated timeously.

12. A party to an action in the Sheriff Court who had allowed the agent of his opponent to obtain decree for expenses in his own name held to be barred by the exception of competent and omitted from suspending a charge on the allegations (1) that the agent had not, at the time when the motion for expenses was made, paid his dues as a law-agent, and (2) that de facto he was not the agent-disburser. *Rennie v. FISHING. Salmon-Fishing—Exercise of right—Fishing by rod and line—Extent of right—Medium filum—Fishing in æmulationem vicini.

1. M., the proprietor of salmon-fishings ex adverso of one bank of a river 60 feet wide, anchored a boat about mid-stream and fished therefrom with rod and line, casting his line not only on his own side of the medium filum, but also on the other side, in such a way as to interfere with an angler fishing for salmon from the opposite bank. In a petition for interdict at the instance of the owner of the salmon-fishings on the opposite bank, held that, even if M. had a right to cast his fly beyond the medium filum, he was not entitled to exercise that right in æmulationem vicini; that here he had acted in æmulationem vicini; and that the petitioner would have been entitled to interdict if she had insisted on it. Campbell v. Muir, Jan. 10, 1908, p. 387.
2. Lord Cowan's statement in Earl of Zetland v. Tennent's Trustees, Feb. 26, 1873, 11 Macph. 469, of the principles applicable to the regulation of salmon-fishing rights between opposite proprietors, as regards the medium filum of the river, approved; and opinion that these principles apply to fishing by rod and line as well as to fishing by net and coble. Campbell v. Muir, Jan. 10, 1908, p. 387.

Sea Fishing—Trawling within Prohibited Area—Offence committed by member of crew acting under orders—Duty of Prosecutor to prove guilty knowledge—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 7 (1)—Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, sec. 10 (4), (5)—Bye-laws Nos. 10 and 14 of Fishery Board for Scotland.

3. Held (1) that it was no defence to a charge of trawling within a prohibited area that the accused occupied a subordinate position on the vessel and acted under the orders of his superior officers; (2) that the prosecutor was not bound to prove that the accused knew the position of the vessel when the offence was committed. Question whether it would have been a sufficient defence for the accused to prove that he did not know that the trawling was within the prohibited area. Gordon v. Shaw, Jan. 17, 1908, (J.) p. 17.

In a process in Scotland for the judicial sale of a British ship, then lying in a Scottish port, warrant for sale was granted, and the ship was sold. A claim for a preferential ranking on the purchase price was lodged in the process by a New York firm, who alleged that by American law they had a good lien over the ship for certain expenditure incurred by them on her account while she was lying at New York. Held that the question whether any claimants in the process had a lien over the ship fell to be determined by Scots law, and not by American law. *Clark v. Held that in virtue of sec. 33 of the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, incorporated with the Leith Harbour and Docks Acts, 1875 and 1892, and of sec. 58 of the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1892, a shipowner was entitled to have access to and egress from any of the docks included in Leith Harbour for any of his vessels free of any charge other than the rates payable under sec. 58 and Schedule (B) of the special Act of 1892, at all times when such access and egress could be given with safety, either by means of the locks giving access to such docks or otherwise, and when accommodation was available, but subject to the right of the harbour-master to give directions for all or any of the purposes set out in the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and also subject to the right of the Leith Docks Commissioners to make bye-laws as allowed by that Act or either of their special Acts of 1875 and 1892; and that sec. 60 of the Leith Harbour Act of 1892 entitling the Commissioners to make "reasonable charges for work done, services rendered, facilities afforded, and use of plant," &c., applied only to special facilities (the use of cranes, &c.), asked for and received after the vessel had got access to the harbour and docks. *Somerville v. HUSBAND AND WIFE. Jus Administrationis—Wife living apart from her husband "with his consent"—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 5.

1. Circumstances in which—in a petition by a wife praying the Court to dispense with her husband's consent to the granting of certain deeds by her—the Court held that the wife was in fact living apart from her husband with his consent, although he had repeatedly protested against her continuing to live apart, and granted the petition. M'Lennan v. M'Lennan, Nov. 21, 1907, p. 164.

Expenses in consistorial actions—Wife's Expenses of reclaiming note.

2. Per curiam (after consulting Judges of the Second Division)—Where in an action of divorce a wife has been unsuccessful in the Outer-House, and then presents a reclaiming note, the question whether she is entitled to her expenses, if she is again unsuccessful, must depend on whether the case was a fair one to bring before the Court. The prima facie view of the case is that the Lord Ordinary is right, and therefore it is for the wife to shew that the case was a fair one for reclaiming. Thomson v. Thomson, Nov. 22, 1907, p. 179.
3. Circumstances in which the Court allowed a wife, against whom decree of divorce had been pronounced by a Lord Ordinary, the expenses of a reclaiming note, although the Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's judgment. Thomson v. Thomson, Nov. 22, 1907, p. 179.

Donation inter virum et uxorem—Revocation—Sums of money consumed.

4. In an action by a wife against her husband for the recovery of certain sums of money, she alleged that these sums had been lent or paid to, or applied for behoof of, her husband by her, as donations inter virum et uxorem, and that these donations had been revoked by her. The Court allowed a proof prout de jure quoad those sums which ex facie did not bear to have been applied and consumed, but quoad those sums which ex facie had been applied and consumed, repelled the pursuer's claim as irrelevant. Fenton Livingstone v. Fenton Livingstone, March 9, 1907, p. 286.

Donation inter virum et uxorem—Implied Revocation.

5. A husband in 1878 invested £4000 in name of trustees in trust for his wife in liferent allenary. Neither the wife nor the trustees ever received payment of the interest on the sum so invested. In 1889, the wife, at the request of the husband, signed a letter acknowledging receipt of the annual interest which had accrued on the trust funds. In a question raised after the husband's death, as to whether the wife's right to the interest, being a donation inter virum et uxorem, had been revoked by the husband, held that the letter of 1889 negatived any presumption of revocation which might arise from the non-payment of the interest. Question whether the non-payment of income by the truster was a habile mode of revoking a gift of income, constituted by a formal trust-deed and by handing over of the capital to the trustees. Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd, July 11, 1908, p. 1147.

Wife's separate estate—Loan to husband by wife out of her separate estate—Sequestration of Husband—Claim by Wife's Executor—Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 1 (4).

6. A wife lent to her husband a sum of money out of estate acquired by her under a deed of settlement, which excluded his jus mariti and right of administration. A year after the wife's death the husband was sequestrated, and, the loan not having been repaid, his wife's executor lodged a claim in the sequestration as an ordinary creditor for the amount of the debt. Held (1) that section 1 (4) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, applied to money lent by a wife to her husband out of her separate estate, whether the jus mariti was excluded by deed or by the operation of the statute; (2) that the wife, at the date of her death, had merely a jus crediti liable to be defeated in the event of her husband's bankruptcy, and that her executor took no higher right; and, accordingly (3) that the claim by the wife's executor to an ordinary ranking fell to be disallowed, under reservation of the claimant's right to participate in any balance of the husband's estate after the claims of other creditors for value had been satisfied. Mitchell's Executor v. Mitchell's Trustee, July 2, 1908, p. 1046.

Divorce—Desertion—Insanity of defender.

7. The circumstance that a spouse, who has been in desertion for four years, becomes insane after the expiry of that period and remains so at the date of an action of divorce on the ground of desertion brought by the injured spouse, does not render the action incompetent. Scott v. Scott, July 11, 1908, p. 1124.

Divorce—Desertion—"Reasonable Cause"—Act 1573, cap. 55.

8. Circumstances in which held that a wife who had deserted her husband had no reasonable cause for non-adherence. Question whether in an action of adherence a wife can successfully defend herself upon any other grounds than would be required in order to sustain an action at her instance for separation and aliment. M'Ewan v. M'Ewan, July 18, 1908, p. 1263.

Divorce—Desertion—Interruption—Action of separation at defender's instance—Act 1573, cap. 55.

9. A wife deserted her husband, and after having been in desertion for about a year raised an action of separation against him, in which she was unsuccessful. Thereafter she continued to refuse to live with him. In an action of divorce on the ground of desertion at the instance of the husband, raised four years after the date of desertion, the wife pleaded that the period during which the action of separation was being carried on should be deducted from the four years, as during that period she was not in "malicious and obstinate defection." Held that in the circumstances of the case she was not entitled to the deduction claimed. M'Ewan v. M'Ewan, July 18, 1908, p. 1263.

Divorce—Desertion—Privy Admonition—Act 1573, cap. 55.

10. A husband, whose wife had deserted him, and who had frequently expressed his desire that she should return, signed an agreement with her about a year and a half after the date of desertion with reference to the custody of the child of the marriage, in which he stated that "he adheres to his former requests to her to return to live with him, and desires that she should do so." He had no further communication with her, and about two years and a half later raised an action of divorce for desertion. Held, in view of the circumstances of the case, that this declaration was a standing offer to his wife to return and needed no repetition, and that the husband had not failed in his duty to give "privy admonitions for due adherence" in terms of the Act 1573, cap. 55. M'Ewan v. M'Ewan, July 18, 1908, p. 1263.

Divorce—Adultery—Lenocinium.

11. A husband who was not on good terms with his wife, and had reason to suspect her conduct, was informed that she intended to visit a man at Gateshead, with whom he knew she had been corresponding, and he instructed detectives to watch her movements. His wife informed him that she desired to visit friends at Stirling, and asked if she should go. She also asked for money. He replied "Certainly go," and gave her £2. She went to Gateshead, where an act of adultery was committed. Held that the facts did not support a plea of lenocinium, and decree of divorce granted. Thomson v. Thomson, Nov. 22, 1907, p. 179.

A commercial traveller for a manufacturing jeweller on arriving at a hotel on a Saturday afternoon handed to the hotel porter a bag, containing jewels to the value of £1800, to be placed in the office. The traveller made no statement as to its value, but he was in use to visit the hotel, and the hotelkeepers knew that he was in the habit of carrying jewellery with him. At 11.30 p.m. he asked for the bag with the view of taking it to his bedroom, when it was discovered that his bag had been stolen. Another bag of the same size and appearance had been left at the office by one of three guests in the hotel who disappeared the same evening without paying their bill, and leaving behind them certain burglar's tools. In an action by the jeweller against the hotelkeepers for the value of the bag, the defenders pleaded, inter alia, the statutory limitation of liability to £30 under the Innkeepers Liability Act, 1863, sec. 1. The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) that the goods having been deposited with the defenders for safe custody he was entitled to indemnity; and (2) that the goods having been stolen through the default or neglect of the defenders or of their servants, they were liable in damages. The Extra Division held (1) that the bag had not been deposited "expressly" for safe custody within the meaning of sec. 1, subsec. (2), of the Act; (2) that the onus of proving that it had been lost through "default or neglect" on the part of the defenders or of their servants lay upon the pursuer, and that that onus had not been discharged; and therefore (3) that the defenders were entitled to the benefit of the statutory limitation of liability. In an appeal the House affirmed the judgment. Whitehouse v. Pickett, June 26, 1908, (H. L.) p. 31.

INSURANCE. Widows' Fund of Corporation—Contributor expelled from the Corporation—Right to remain a contributor—Glasgow Faculty of Procurators Widows' Fund Act, 1833—Glasgow Faculty of Procurators Act, 1875, sec. 3.

1. In 1901 C., a member of the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow, who had become a contributor to the Glasgow Procurators Widows' Fund in 1870, was struck off the roll of the Faculty in respect of his having been convicted of a crime, and subsequently the Widows' Fund Society declined to receive his contributions. In an action of declarator brought by C. and his wife and children against the Widows' Fund Society, the First Division held that as C. was no longer a member of the Faculty of Procurators he was not entitled to contribute to the Widows' Fund, and that at his death his widow and children would have no right to the benefit of the fund. In an appeal, held that while it was a condition of a person being admitted as a member of the Widows' Fund that he should be a member of the Faculty of Procurators, it was not a condition of the contract of insurance that he should continue to be a member of that Faculty during his life, and that C. was still a contributor. Colquhoun v. Society of Contributors to Widows' Fund of Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, March 17, 1908, (H. L.) p. 10.

Life Insurance—Declarator of right to unmaturred policy.

2. Assignees of an unsundered policy of life insurance raised an action of declarator during the lifetime of the insured, in which they called as defenders (1) the insurance company, and (2) former holders of the policy. The action concluded for declarator (1) that the pursuers were in right of the policy, and (2) that the insurance com- pany were bound, on the sums contained in the policy falling due, to make payment thereof to the pursuers, or the persons deriving right from them. The insurance company alone lodged defences. Held that the action so far as directed against the company was incompetent and premature, and should be dismissed, in respect that, until the policy matured, it was impossible to say to whom the proceeds would be payable, and that the insurance company were not the proper contradictors in a question as to whom the policy in the meantime belonged. Allgemeine Deutsche Credit Anstalt v. Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, Oct. 26, 1907, p. 33.

Life Insurance—Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, sec. 4 (2), and sec. 14 (1)—Transfer to another company—Notice.

3. F., who was insured with an industrial assurance company (company A), in September 1906 applied for and obtained a policy of insurance from another industrial assurance company (company B). F. paid the weekly premium on both insurances down to 10th December 1906. F. thereafter applied for and obtained from the B company a policy on the same terms as he got from the A company. The provisions of the new policy were more favourable to the assured than the provisions of the general tables of company B, and the insurance required to be sanctioned by the directors of company B. The directors were not, but the agent who negotiated with F. was, aware that F. had been insured with company A. F.'s insurance with company A did not lapse for about two months after he had ceased paying his contributions. No notice was sent by company B to company A. Held that the transaction was a transfer of F.'s insurance from company A to company B, and that company B not having given notice in terms of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act, 1896, sec. 4 (2), had committed an offence under sec. 14 (1). Salvation Army Assurance Society v. British Legal Life Assurance Co., July 11, 1908, p. 1138.

1. Form of issue approved in an action of damages against a railway company, at the instance of the widow and children of a passenger who had died from injuries received in a railway accident, where the defenders admitted liability for the injuries of the deceased. *Black v. JOINT AND SEVERAL. Summons—Decree.

In an action of payment against six defenders "jointly and severally," three of the defenders were assoilzied. Held that a decree against the remaining defenders conjunctly and severally was competent. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. Powers of Factor—Power to levy rates—Greenock Harbour Act, 1880, sec. 70.

1. Held that a judicial factor appointed under sec. 70 of the Greenock Harbour Act of 1880 had no power at his own hand to alter the harbour rates fixed by the harbour trustees, his only duty being to receive and to apply them. Greenock Harbour Trustees v. Judicial Factor of Greenock Harbour Trust, June 11, 1908, p. 944.

JURISDICTION. Heritable Office—Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland.

Held that the Court of Session had jurisdiction to determine claims to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland, that office being a heritable office and not a mere title of honour, and the right to the office being a right of property which was within the cognisance of the Court. *Earl of Lauderdale v. JUSTICIARY CASES. Jurisdiction—Review—Suspension—Exclusion of Suspension—Special Statutory Appeal—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, secs. 53, 91, 102, and 103.

1. A publican who had been convicted of breach of certificate, "upon a complaint bearing that it was a third offence," brought a suspension upon the ground that (after evidence for the prosecution and the defence had been led, the cases for the respective parties closed, and parties heard with regard to the particular breach alleged, and after the justices had found the accused guilty thereof), a witness was put in to prove two previous convictions against the accused; that this evidence was incompetently admitted; that no other evidence of the offence charged being a third offence had been led; and that such evidence should have been led, as this was a substantive part of the charge. Held that the procedure complained of amounted to nothing more at most than a "deviation in point of form from the statutory enactment," that consequently the only form of review competent was an appeal under sec. 102 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, and that the suspension was incompetent. Mitchell v. Morrison, May 13, 1908, (J.) p. 65.

Statutory Offences—Mens rei—Offence committed by member of crew of vessel acting under orders.

2. Held that it was no defence to a charge of trawling within prohibited waters that the accused occupied a subordinate position on the vessel and acted under the orders of his superior officers. Gordon v. Shaw, Jan. 17, 1908, (J.) p. 17.

Statutory Offences—Guilty Knowledge—Onus on Prosecutor.

3. Held that, in a prosecution against a member of the crew of a trawler for trawling in prohibited waters contrary to a bye-law of the Scottish Fishery Board, the prosecutor was not bound to prove that the accused knew the position of the vessel when the offence was committed. Question whether it would have been a sufficient defence for the accused to prove that he did not know that the trawling was within the prohibited area. Gordon v. Shaw, Jan. 17, 1908, (J.) p. 17.
4. Question whether in the case of statutory offences, if the word "knowingly" is not used, ignorance can ever be a defence. Gordon v. Shaw, Jan. 17, 1908, (J.) p. 17.

Statutory Offences—Betting—Street Betting Act, 1906, secs. 1 (1) and (4) and 3—“Passage.”

5. In a prosecution under the Street Betting Act, 1906, for loitering in a public passage for the purpose of betting, it was proved (a) that the passage in question was a passage to which the public had no right of access, but to which the public in fact could obtain access owing to the lock of the door being broken, and (b) that it led directly to a court which gave access to at least one common stair. Held that the passage in question was not a public passage within the meaning of sec. 1 (4) of the Street Betting Act, 1906; and (2) that it was not a passage leading to a common close or common stair within the meaning of sec. 3 of that Act. Hasson v. Neilson, May 12, 1908, (J.) p. 57.

Statutory Offences—Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, sec. 1—Police-constable—Bribery.

6. In a complaint under the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, charging an attempt to bribe a police-constable in Glasgow while in the execution of his duty and acting for his employer, the Chief Constable, held that the police-constable was an agent in the sense of the Act. Graham v. Hart, Jan. 17, 1908, (J.) p. 26.

Statutory Offences—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, secs. 7 and 20—“Crime”—“Theft which may be punished with penal servitude.”

7. Held that where a person had been convicted in the Sheriff Court on indictment of theft, aggravated by five previous convictions of theft and attempt to steal obtained in the Sheriff and Police Courts (followed by sentences varying from fourteen days' to six months' imprisonment), he had been convicted of a “crime,” and had had “a previous conviction of a crime” proved against him, within the meaning of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, although he had never been convicted in any Court which could competently impose a sentence of penal servitude. Martin v. Boyd, May 12, 1908, (J.) p. 52.

Statutory Offences—Salmon Fishing—Weekly Close Time—Reasonable Excuse—Sunday Labour—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 24, and Schedule D, Bye-law 3.

8. In a prosecution for a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, and sec. 24, and Schedule D, Bye-law 3, it was proved that the leaders of certain bag-nets had not been removed by the occupier of the fishery on a Saturday night, and could not have been then removed owing to a storm; that they could have been removed without danger on Sunday, but that no attempt was made to do so, and that they were not removed till Monday morning. The accused pleaded that the removal of the nets on the Sunday was an impossibility, inasmuch as it would have involved a breach of the Sunday Labour Statutes, 1579, c. 70, 1661, c. 18, and 1690, c. 5, which she was not bound to commit or procure others to commit. Held that the accused was not justified in failing to comply with the bye-law, the operation thereby prescribed being a work of necessity and not struck at by the Sunday Labour Statutes, and in any event enjoined by an Act of Parliament of later date. Middleton v. Tough, March 10, 1908, (J.) p. 32.

Procedure—Indictment—Relevancy—Locus—Latitude—Reset.

9. In a summary complaint for reset of forty-four different articles the crime was libelled as having been committed at four different specified places in Glasgow, “or at one or other of said places, or elsewhere in Glasgow, the particular place or places being to the complainer unknown.” Held that, this being a case of reset, the latitude taken regards the locus was legitimate. Gold v. Neilson, Nov. 7, 1907, (J.) p. 5.

Procedure—Indictment—Relevancy—Specification—Fair Notice—Reset—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, secs. 19 and 58.

10. An indictment for reset set forth that "during the period between 1st July 1907 and 3d March 1908," at a place libelled, "on different occasions during said period, the particular occasions being to the prosecutor unknown," the accused "did reset in all 25 lbs. of brass and copper electric and gas fittings, and 25 lbs. of solder, the same having been dishonestly appropriated by theft." Annexed there were (1) a list of productions, including certain specified brass and copper electric and gas fittings, and 2 lbs. 10 ounces of solder; and (2) a list of witnesses. Held that, in view of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, secs. 19 and 58, the indictment was relevant; and that read along with the lists of productions and witnesses it gave the accused sufficient notice of the charge he had to meet. Maguire v. H. M. Advocate, May 12, 1908, (J.) p. 49.

Procedure—Proof—Proof of previous conviction—Proof of previous conviction of theft aggravated by previous conviction—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, secs. 7 and 20—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 67.

11. Held in a prosecution under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, that in view of sec. 67 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, the production of an extract of a previous conviction on indictment in the Sheriff Court of theft aggravated by five previous convictions, three of theft and two of attempt to steal, scheduled thereto, was, in the absence of any objection by the prisoner to such previous convictions, sufficient evidence both of a conviction on indictment of a "crime," and of previous conviction of a "crime," within the meaning of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871. Martin v. Boyd, May 12, 1908, (J.) p. 52.
12. Procedure—Proof—Public-House Offence—Third Offence—Procedure in proving that offence is third offence. Mitchell v. Morrison, May 13, 1908, (J.) p. 65.

Procedure—Proof—Witness—Citation of witnesses for precognition on oath—Lotteries Act, 1823.

13. The Procurator-fiscal of a county presented a petition to the Sheriff setting forth that at a Masonic bazaar held in October 1907 a lottery had been carried on in contravention of the Lotteries Act, 1823, and that the Chief Constable had endeavoured to get evidence against persons engaged in the lottery from persons able to give information, but that they had refused to give it, and praying for a warrant to cite all available witnesses for precognition on oath if necessary. The Sheriff granted the warrant craved, and certain persons were cited. The Court suspended the warrant and citations. Observed that it was conceivable that in very serious cases such a warrant and citation might be justifiable. Forbes v. Main, March 20, 1908, (J.) p. 46.

Summary Procedure—Competency of challenging validity of regulation in Summary Proceeding—Motor-Car Act, 1903, secs. 9 and 18.

14. Question whether it was competent in a summary proceeding to challenge the validity of a regulation made by the Secretary for Scotland under sec. 18 (3) of the Motor-Car Act, 1903. Stewart v. Todrick, Dec. 4, 1907, (J.) p. 8.

Summary Procedure—Complaint—Instance—Company.

Summary Procedure—Conduct of Trial—Record of Proceedings—List of witnesses—Misnomer of witness—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 16.

16. In the record of proceedings on a summary complaint the name of the first witness was entered as "Joseph Milligan" instead of "Joseph Milliken," but Milliken's designation and address were correctly stated. Held that the misnomer was not a sufficient ground for suspending a conviction. Gold v. Neilson, Nov. 7, 1907, (J.) p. 5.

Summary Procedure—Conviction—Charge of resetting different articles at different times and places—Conviction in general terms—Reset.

17. A person was charged on a summary complaint with resetting forty-four different articles during a period of three weeks at four specified places in Glasgow, "or at one or other of said places, or elsewhere in Glasgow." Objections to the relevancy were repelled, and the accused on evidence was found "guilty of the crime charged." Held that it was not necessary in the conviction to specify the particular articles which the accused was found guilty of resetting, or the particular times and places at which the articles had been reset. Gold v. Neilson, Nov. 7, 1907, (J.) p. 5.

18. Observed (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that a conviction of "guilty as libelled" means guilty of all that is libelled or of a substantial part thereof, and that in the ordinary case where the crime is alleged to have been committed as regards a number of different articles, and there is doubt as to the guilt of the accused as to some of the articles libelled, it is not necessary to mention this in the conviction. Gold v. Neilson, Nov. 7, 1907, (J.) p. 5.

19. A person was charged with loitering in a street libelled "for the purpose of bookmaking or betting or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, or paying or receiving or settling bets," contrary to the Street Betting Act, 1906, sec. 1. He was found "guilty of the offence charged." Held that this was not a case to which the rule against a general conviction proceeding upon an alternative charge could be held to apply, and conviction sustained. Stenhouse v. Dykes, May 13, 1908, (J.) p. 61.

Summary Procedure—Conviction—Food and Drugs—Delivery of milk in several cans—Deficiency of quality in each can—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, secs. 6, 13—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 3.

20. Samples having been taken from fourteen out of sixteen cans of milk in course of delivery in one consignment, and all the samples having been found deficient in quality, the consignor was charged with and convicted of fourteen offences under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. Held that, there having been only one delivery, it was incompetent to charge and convict of more than one offence. Telford v. Fyfe, July 16, 1908, (J.) p. 83.

Summary Procedure—Sentences—Competency—Form—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 18, Schedule K, No. 6, sec. 34.

21. A conviction in form No. 6 of Schedule K of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, granted warrant to arrest all debts and sums of money owing to the accused, and to poind his goods and sell the same, and appointed a return of such poinding and sale to be made "within eight days from the expiration of the period hereby allowed for payment." No period was allowed for payment, the interlocutor ordaining instant execution. Opinion that the conviction was not incompetent as being impossible of execution. Telford v. Fyfe, July 16, 1908, (J.) p. 83.

Summary Procedure—Sentence—Imprisonment in default of immediate payment of fine—Street Betting Act, 1906, secs. 1 (1) (a) and 3—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 18 (3) and (6), Schedule K, 3 and 6—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, sec. 6 (b).

22. A person who had been convicted of an offence under sec. 1 (1) (a) of the Street Betting Act, 1906, was fined £10, "and in default of immediate payment thereof" was sentenced to be imprisoned for thirty days, this sentence being in the form of Schedule K, 3, of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864. Held that, in view of the provisions of sec. 3 of the Street Betting Act, 1906, and of sec. 6 (b) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, this was a case of a contravention of an Act of Parliament under which the accused, in default of payment of a penalty, was liable to be imprisoned for a period limited to a certain time in the sense of sec. 18 (3) of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and that consequently a sentence in the form of Schedule K, 3, of that Act was competent. Stenhouse v. Dykes, May 13, 1908, (J.) p. 61.

Summary Procedure—Sentence—Common Law Offence—Notice of Penalty—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 29—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 490.

23. A summary complaint in a burgh Police Court, charging assault at common law, was headed "Under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887," and did not contain any reference to the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. Held that it was competent for the Magistrate on this complaint to pronounce a sentence within the maximum authorised by sec. 490 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, although the sentence was in excess of the maximum authorised by sec. 29 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864. Findlay v. Walker, July 18, 1907, (J.) p. 2.

Summary Procedure—Appeal from Sheriff to Court of Quarter Sessions—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, secs. 2 (5), 21.

24. The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 28), enacts:—Sec. 2 (5). "If any person feels aggrieved by any conviction made by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, he may appeal therefrom to a Court of Quarter Sessions." Sec. 21. "In the application of this Act to Scotland the following modifications shall be made:—
 . . . The expression 'Court of Summary Jurisdiction' means the Sheriff Court, and all jurisdiction necessary for the purpose of this Act is hereby conferred on Sheriffs." Held that in a prosecution in Scotland under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, the above enactments did not make it competent to appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff to a Court of Quarter Sessions. Turnbull v. H. M. Advocate, March 20, 1908, (J.) p. 47.

Review—Suspension—Improper statement by prosecutor.

25. In a suspension, the complainer, inter alia, alleged that in his address to the magistrate the prosecutor (the procurator-fiscal) had made an allegation which was not proved in the evidence. In his answers the procurator-fiscal stated that the magistrate had intimated that he would not allow himself to be influenced by the allegation complained of. The Court refused the suspension. Martin v. Boyd, May 12, 1908, (J.) p. 52.

Review—Suspension—Sentence—Illegal Sentence—Detention in Reformatory—Restriction of Sentence—Competency—Reformatory Schools Act, 1893, sec. 1.

26. Three boys, all fifteen years of age, were each sentenced to be detained for four years in a reformatory, the effect of this sentence being that the period of detention would not expire until after the time at which the offenders would attain the age of nineteen years, which is contrary to sec. 1 of the Reformatory Schools Act, 1893. The offenders having brought a suspension, counsel for the Crown did not oppose the quashing of the sentence. The Court quashed the conviction and sentence as ultra vires and illegal. Sweenie v. Hart, June 18, 1908, (J.) p. 81.

27. Observed that there might be circumstances in which the Court would, instead of quashing a sentence of detention in a reformatory, reduce the period of detention so as to make it conform to the statute. Sweenie v. Hart, June 18, 1908, (J.) p. 81.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. See Lease—River, Loch, and Sea, 1, 2.

LEASE. Constitution—Verbal lease followed by written lease—Obligation inserted in written lease—Date from which obligation takes effect.

1. In 1895 a moorland farm was let verbally for nineteen years, and the tenant entered into possession. The parties were at variance as to the amount of heather-burning per annum that was to be undertaken by the landlord, and that question remained unsettled till 1902, when a lease was signed by the parties, in which the landlord undertook to burn, one year with another, one-twelfth part of the heather annually. The lease also bore that the farm was let "for the period of nineteen years from and after the term of Martinmas 1895, which, notwithstanding the date hereof, is declared to be the term of entry hereunder." Held that the obligation to burn one-twelfth part of the heather annually ran from Martinmas 1895, and not from the date of the lease in 1902. Ramsay v. Howison, March 5, 1908, p. 697.

Construction—"Tenantable condition and repair."

2. An obligation on the part of a landlord to put buildings, fences, drains, &c., at the commencement of a lease "in tenantable condition and repair" is more onerous than the obligation which lies upon a tenant at the end of a lease to leave these subjects in tenantable condition and repair. Davidson v. Logan, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 350.

Damages—Claim by tenant for breach of condition of the lease—Failure to burn heather—Payment of rent without reservation.

3. The tenant of a farm, under a lease which contained an obligation by the landlord to burn one year with another a certain quantity of heather per annum, possessed under the lease for nine years, during which period, although he repeatedly complained of the landlord's failure to burn sufficient heather, he paid the rent each half year without deduction or reservation of any claim for damages, and took clean receipts therefor. In the tenth year he brought an action against the landlord for damages suffered in that and the preceding year, in consequence of the failure to burn sufficient heather. The landlord pleaded in defence that the tenant, by paying the rent up to the ninth year without reservation, was barred from claiming damages for default committed prior to that date. Held, in the circumstances, that as the damage from failure to burn heather was cumulative, and as it was impossible to determine by what year the damage would declare itself, the tenant could not be assumed by his actings to have waived his claim. Ramsay v. Howison, March 5, 1908, p. 697.

Damages—Insanitary House—Title to Sue—Wife and Children of Tenant.

4. Held that the wife and children of the tenant of a dwelling-house had no title to sue the landlord for damages for loss and injury caused to them by illness due to the insanitary condition of the house. Cameron v. Young, Feb. 27, 1908, (H. L.) p. 7.

Outgoing—Obligation in lease to take over sheep stock—Transmission of obligation against succeeding heir of entail.

6. Heir of entail in possession held not bound to implement an obligation in a lease, granted by the preceding heir of entail, to purchase the tenant's stock of sheep at the termination of the lease. Gillespie v. Riddell, Feb. 20, 1908, p. 628.

Outgoing—Obligation in lease to take over sheep stock—Transmission of obligation against personal representatives of lessor—Lease by heir of entail.

7. Executors of an heir of entail held bound to implement an obligation in a lease, granted by him, to purchase the tenant's sheep stock at a valuation at the expiration of the tenancy. Gardiniers v. Stewart's Trustees, June 16, 1908, p. 985.

Outgoing—Compensation for Improvements—Agreement—Fair and reasonable Compensation—Arbitration—Powers and Duties of Arbiter—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, sec. 5, and Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900, secs. 1 and 2 (1).

8. In an arbitration between a landlord and an outgoing tenant as to the amount of compensation for improvements to which the tenant was entitled, the tenant objected to the scale of compensation fixed by the lease at the commencement of his tenancy on the ground that it was not fair and reasonable, and claimed compensation on the scale fixed by the Act of 1883. Held that the arbiter, in order to explicate his jurisdiction, was bound to decide whether the scale of compensation fixed by the lease was, at its date, fair and reasonable and so fell to be applied. Observed that the decision of the arbiter on this question would not be final, and might be challenged in a process of interdict or of reduction. Bell v. Graham, June 16, 1908, p. 1060.

Long Lease—Right in security—Assignment in security of long lease—Action of mails and duties—Competency—Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, secs. 6 and 20—Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1847, sec. 2.

9. Held that as the Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, in giving to the person in right of an assignment in security of a recorded long lease a right to enter on possession and uplift the rents, had provided a special procedure for his doing so, it by implication excluded any other mode of procedure, and that an action of mails and duties at his instance was incompetent. Dunbar v. Gill, July 4, 1908, p. 1054.

By her antenuptial contract of marriage a wife conveyed to the trustees therein named the whole estate then belonging to her, "or to which she may succeed or acquire right during the subsistence of the marriage." Her father having died during the subsistence of the marriage, leaving a settlement under which she was a beneficiary, questions arose between herself and her marriage-contract trustees as to the exercise of the right to elect between legitim and the testamentary provision. Held that the right to elect remained with the wife, and had not been carried to the trustees by the conveyance of acquirenda in the marriage-contract. Mackenzie's Trustees v. Beveridge's Trustees, July 17, 1908, p. 1185.

MASTER AND SERVANT. Duration of Contract—Agreement by master to give "regular employment" to servant.

1. By an agreement in settlement of a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the master, in addition to agreeing to make immediate payment of a lump sum to the claimant, agreed to give the claimant "regular employment at a fixed weekly wage of 23s." After three years the master dismissed him. Held that the agreement did not give the claimant a right to permanent employment so long as he was willing and able to do the work. Lawrie v. Brown & Co., Limited, March 6, 1908, p. 705.

Liability of master for negligence of servant—Whether servant of A, pro hac vice, servant of B.

2. Arrangement between owner of trawl boat and Fishery Board which held not to make master of trawler servant, pro hac vice, of Fishery Board. Burgoyne v. Walker, Dec. 11, 1907, p. 321.

Liability of master for slander uttered by servant.

3. Held that an employer is liable for a verbal slander uttered by his servant in the course of the servant's employment and for the benefit of the master. Averments held relevant to support an action against a master for a slander uttered by his servant. Averments held irrelevant in an action against a master for words uttered by his servant. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, June 9, 1908, p. 928.

5. Averments held relevant in an action against the proprietors of a hydropathic for wrongful detention of a guest by their manager. Mackenzie v. Cluny Hill Hydropathic Co., Limited, Nov. 23, 1907, p. 200.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 1, subsec. (1)—Accident arising out of and in course of employment.

7. A station policeman in the employment of a railway company was run down by an engine on a siding at the station and died shortly afterwards of his injuries. There was no evidence to shew how or why he came to be at the spot where he was injured, but he might legitimately have been there in the course of his duties as station policeman. Held that the deceased being a station policeman, the presumption was that he had been injured by accident arising out of and in course of his employment, in the sense of sec. 1, subsec. (1), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and that in the absence of evidence to the contrary this must be taken to be the fact. Grant v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Nov. 22, 1907, p. 187.
8. Smith and Paton, two drawers in a coalpit, were sitting in a hutch, Smith driving the horse. In passing near the working place of another drawer, Burley, Paton took hold of a hutch Burley had been using and pulled it after him. Burley followed and in endeavouring to recapture his hutch pushed Paton with a prop. Paton then threw some rubbish at Burley; in avoiding the rubbish Burley struck his head against a projection on the wall and was injured. Burley having claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, held that although the accident arose in the course of Burley's employment, it did not arise out of it within the meaning of sec. 1 (1) of the Act. Burley v. Baird & Co., Limited, Feb. 7, 1908, p. 545.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 1 (2) (b)—Election to take Compensation under Act—Election inferred from acceptance of weekly payments.

9. In defence to an action of damages at common law for personal injuries, brought by a workman against his master, the master pleaded that the action was barred, in virtue of sec. 1 (2) (b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, by the pursuer having elected to take compensation under the Act. On a proof it appeared that at the end of the week in which he was injured the workman was paid a sum in lieu of wages, and was told that for the next two weeks he would get nothing, but after that he would be paid half wages. He subsequently, for a period of about six months, received each week a sum amounting to slightly more than half his average weekly wage. These payments were at first made at his house, but afterwards, when he had partially recovered, he called for them regularly at his employer's office. No receipts were taken for these payments. Held that the pursuer had elected to accept, and had accepted, compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and was thereby barred from raising this action. Mackay v. Rosie, Nov. 21, 1907, p. 174.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 1 (3)—Arbitration Proceedings—Competency—Unrecorded agreement not acted on for seven years.

10. In March 1899 a miner sustained injuries, by which he was totally incapacitated for his work, and by agreement with his employers he was paid compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from March 1899 till May 1900, at the rate of 14s. 4d. per week, being half his previous wages (the statutory maximum). No memorandum of the agreement was ever recorded, and it was never formally varied or ended under the Act. In May 1900 the employers ceased the weekly payments, and the workman returned to their service, in which he remained working and earning wages, when he was able, as a pit bottomer, till April 1907, when, as the result of his injuries in 1899, he became totally incapacitated for work. No compensation was paid to the workman between May 1900 and April 1907. In 1907 the workman claimed compensation as from May 1900, and the employers having refused to pay compensation as claimed, he instituted arbitration proceedings under the Act. The employers maintained that in respect of the agreement arbitration was incompetent. Held that there was no subsisting agreement between the parties, and that consequently arbitration proceedings were competent. Dempster v. Baird & Co., Limited, March 7, 1908, p. 722.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 7, (2)—Dependants—Wife living apart from husband and not supported by him—Child living with wife and supported by her.

11. In 1895 a wife voluntarily left her husband, and a month afterwards gave birth to a child. By means of her earnings as a weaver, and the assistance of the relatives with whom she lived, she supported herself and child, never asking for and never receiving aliment from her husband. In 1907 her husband was killed by accident in the course of his employment as a workman. Held that neither the wife nor the child were either wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death, and accordingly that they were not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Lindsay v. Stewart M'Glashen & Son, Limited, March 14, 1908, p. 762.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, First Schedule (1) (a)—"Where death results from the injury"—Suicide of workman who had become insane in consequence of accident.

12. The widow of a workman, John Malone, who had committed suicide, brought a claim against his employers for compensation for his death. She averred:—The deceased, who had already lost the sight of his left eye in the course of his employment, received an injury to his right eye by a splinter of iron penetrating it. As a result of the injury the sight of that eye began to fail, and eventually he became almost blind. "Owing to the gradual loss of sight in his right eye and consequent blindness, the said John Malone's mind became affected and he became insane, and on 20th August 1907 he committed suicide in his house at 401 Rutherglen Road. The death of the said John Malone was due to the foresaid accident." The arbiter having dismissed the claim as irrelevant, the Court recalled his determination and remitted to him to allow a proof. Malone v. Cayzer, Irvine, & Co., Jan. 23, 1908, p. 479.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, First Schedule (1) (b)—Incapacity resulting from injury—Injured workman suffering from disease—Incapacity contributed to by disease.

13. A miner, whose right eye was sound, but whose left eye was affected by disease, was able to work under ground. In the course of his employment he met with an accident to his sound eye which so injured it as to render it of little use. Owing to the condition of the diseased eye he was thereafter unable to resume his work under ground. It was proved that the condition of the diseased eye was neither caused nor aggravated by the accident. Held that the workman was suffering from incapacity resulting from the accident. Lee v. William Baird & Co., Limited, June 6, 1908, p. 905.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, First Schedule (12)—Review of weekly payments—Refusal of workman to undergo surgical operation.

14. In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the employers prayed the arbiter under the First Schedule, (12), of the Act to review and end or diminish a weekly payment which was being made to a workman who had been totally incapacitated in consequence of an injury to his left hand. The following facts were proved, viz.:—That the workman's loss of the use of his left hand was caused by the removal of the third finger and the top of the thumb, the existence of pain in the palm, and the permanent curvature of the second finger into the palm; that three doctors, who had examined the workman, recommended that the second finger should be removed, and that a nodule in the palm, which they believed to be the source of the pain, should also be removed; that the proposed operations were simple or minor operations, not attended with appreciable risk or serious pain, and were likely to restore to the workman in large measure, or altogether, the use of his hand for the purpose of his former work; that the workman refused to undergo the operations; and that "his continued incapacity to use his left hand and any continued pain in his left palm are fairly attributable to the want of such operations." Held that the workman by refusing to undergo the operations had precluded himself from any right to receive further compensation. Donnelly v. Baird & Co., Limited, Feb. 1, 1908, p. 536.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Second Schedule (8)—Memorandum of Agreement—Suspension of Charge—Charge for period when earning wages.

15. In July 1906 the employers of a workman, who had been injured, agreed to pay him 14s. 5d. per week, being half his former wage (the statutory maximum) as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the workman received payment of that sum from July to September 1906. A memorandum of the agreement was recorded. The agreement did not refer to the workman's total incapacity, but he admitted that he received the weekly payment in respect of total incapacity. In September 1906 he returned to work with the same employers, and continued in their employment till May 1907, earning wages which averaged 23s. 2d. per week. In May 1907 he charged the employers on the recorded memorandum to pay him compensation at the full rate of 14s. 5d. per week for the period from September 1906 to May 1907. The sum charged for with the addition of the wages earned by him during that period gave an average sum per week considerably in excess of his average weekly earnings before the accident. The employers brought a suspension, and tendered payment of the full difference between his earnings from September 1906 to May 1907 and his earnings for a like period before the accident. The Court, in respect of the workman's refusal to accept the sum tendered, suspended the charge. William Baird & Co., Limited, v. M'Whinnie, Jan. 17, 1908, p. 440.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Second Schedule (8)—Memorandum of Agreement—Suspension of Charge.

16. The employers of a workman, who had been injured, agreed to pay him 15s. 11d. per week, the statutory maximum, as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the workman received payment of that sum from February 1904 to September 1905. A memorandum of the agreement was recorded under the Act. The workman having partially recovered returned to work, earned wages, and accepted payments first of 7s. 9d. and later of 5s. per week between October and December 1905. On 10th January 1906 he left the service of the employers, and thereafter intimated that he was totally incapacitated. The employers having refused to pay more than 5s. per week of compensation, the workman in March 1906 charged them under the recorded agreement for payment of 15s. 11d. per week from 10th January 1906. In a suspension the employers averred (1) that the agreement founded on had been superseded by subsequent agreements to accept first 7s. 9d. and then 5s. per week; (2) that the workman was not incapacitated for work; and asked for a proof of these averments. The Court refused the suspension, upon the ground that it was contrary to the intention of the Act that such questions should be determined by proof in a suspension; and that the employers could have had a sufficient remedy by adopting proceedings under the Act either to have the payments under the original agreement reviewed, or to have the alleged subsequent agreement recorded. Fife Coal Co., Limited, v. Lindsay, Jan. 17, 1908, p. 431.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Second Schedule (8) and (14)—Recorded Memorandum of Agreement—Action of damages for breach of Agreement—Competency.

17. A memorandum of agreement, recorded under par. (8) of the Second Schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, bore to be "in the matter of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897," between L. and B. & Co., and set forth that L. had claimed compensation under the Act from B. & Co.; that the parties were agreed that the maximum compensation to which L. was entitled was

17s. 6d.; and that B. & Co. "agree in lieu of such compensation to give" B "regular employment as a foreman," and "to pay him the fixed weekly wage of 23s. . . . and also to pay him on the date hereof the sum of £90 sterling, and these in full of all his claims for compensation under the said Act." B. & Co. paid £90 to L., and they also employed him on the agreed-on terms for about three years. They then dismissed him. L. brought an action of damages for breach of contract against B. & Co., pleading that the memorandum of agreement embodied two agreements—(a) an agreement to pay £90 as compensation under the Act, and (b) a common law agreement to give the pursuer employment. Held that the action was incompetent in respect that the agreement being indivisible and being recorded, only the remedies provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act were available to L. Lawrie v. Brown & Co., Limited, March 6, 1908, p. 705.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment.

Mullen, a workman, justifiably left the works in which he was employed, to obtain refreshment. While returning to his work he met a squad of his fellow-workmen, who were engaged in hauling a bogie across a public street which intersected the works. M'Ginlay, a fellow-workman of Mullen, came up, and improperly seized the rope by which the bogie was being hauled, and began to pull against the squad. In doing this M'Ginlay slipped and fell over the rope, and was in danger of being injured by the bogie. Mullen came to M'Ginlay's assistance, and succeeded in rescuing him from danger, but before he himself could get out of the way he was jammed by the bogie, and sustained severe injuries. Held that Mullen had not been injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Mullen v. Stewart & Co., Limited, June 17, 1908, p. 991. A workman, while engaged, in the course of his employment, in moving a weight, had an attack of cerebral hæmorrhage as the result of the exertion he was using. The work was being performed in the ordinary manner. He was put to bed, and four days later a second attack supervened, which caused permanent paralysis. At the time of the first attack his arteries were in a degenerate condition, which rendered such an attack more likely to occur. Held that the workman's final disablement had been caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. M'Innes v. Dunsmuir & Jackson, June 23, 1908, p. 1021.

A workman engaged in overtime work on a vessel went ashore at night, against the orders of his foreman, to purchase bread. The vessel was moored 6 or 7 feet from the quay, and a gangway was to the knowledge of the workman placed between the vessel and the quay. The deck of the vessel was 3 feet above the quay. The workman in returning went past the end of the gangway, and attempted to jump from the quay to the vessel, but fell into the water and was drowned. It was a rule of the employment (which, however, was frequently broken) that men should not jump between the vessel and the quay, and the deceased had been warned against this practice. Held that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the deceased's employment. Martin v. Fullerton & Co., June 30, 1908, p. 1030.

In an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the onus is on the claimant to prove that the accident arose out of and in the course of the workman's employment. O'Brien v. Star Line, Limited, July 18, 1908, p. 1258.

22. A fireman, whose duty it was to remain on board the ship where he was employed, went ashore without permission, and returned to the ship in the evening intoxicated. In the morning he was found fatally injured at the bottom of a hold. The only access to the hold was in a part of the vessel where the fireman had no right to be, through a door which was kept locked, but which had been broken open. In a claim for compensation brought by dependants of the fireman, the above facts were proved. There was no evidence to shew how the door of the hold had been broken open, or how the fireman had got to the hold, or how the accident had happened. Held that the claimants had failed to prove that the accident arose out of and in the course of the fireman's employment; and accordingly that they were not entitled to compensation. O'Brien v. Star Line, Limited, July 18, 1908, p. 1258.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 1 (2) (c)—Serious and Wilful Misconduct—Coal Mines Regulations Act, 1887, secs. 51 and 52—Breach of Special Rule.

23. By the Additional Special Rules in force in a coal mine, under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulations Act, 1887, it was provided, Rule 3:—"The bottomer at a mid-working in a vertical shaft . . . shall not open the gate fencing the shaft until the cage is stopped at such mid-working." A bottomer at a mid-working in that mine, who required a cage, signalled for a cage at the bottom of the shaft to be sent to the mid-working. He did so by the ordinary method in use in that mine, viz., by calling to the bottomer at the foot of the shaft, who thereupon signalled to the engineman at the surface to draw up the cage. On receiving such a signal the engineman usually stopped the cage in the course of its ascent at the mid-working, but was not bound to do so, and did not invariably do so. On the signal to raise the cage being given the bottomer opened the gate, and, without ascertaining whether the cage had really stopped, went behind a hutch to push it into the cage, but the cage on the occasion in question had not been stopped at the mid-working, and the hutch fell to the foot of the shaft, drawing the bottomer with it, whereby he was injured, but not seriously and permanently disabled. In an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the arbitrator found that the injuries were attributable to the serious and wilful misconduct of the workman, and assoilzied the defenders. In an appeal, held that the facts found proved were sufficient to entitle the arbitrator to arrive at that conclusion, and appeal dismissed. George v. Glasgow Coal Co., Limited, May 27, 1908, p. 846.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, secs. 1 (3), 13, First Sched. 8—Arbitrator—Jurisdiction—Proof of relationship incidental to arbitration.

24. In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, a claim was made by a girl who alleged that she was an illegitimate child of the deceased workman. The arbitrator sisted procedure in order that she might establish her allegation in a competent Court. In an appeal the Court recalled the sist, holding that it was the duty of the arbitrator, in determining the question whether the claimant was a dependant, to decide incidentally her relationship to the deceased. Johnstone v. Spencer & Co., June 18, 1908, p. 1015.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, secs. 3 and 15—Contracting-out—Scheme certified under Act of 1897—Re-certification.

25. The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, came into operation on 1st July 1907. A workman entered an employment on 9th August 1907, and agreed to accept a scale of compensation provided by a scheme certified under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,— the certificate bearing that the scheme was to expire on 31st December 1908. On 15th August 1907, when the scheme had not been re-certified under sec. 15 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the workman was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. Held, on a construction of secs. 3 and 15 of the Act of 1906, that, the workman having entered on his employment after 1st July 1907, he was not barred from obtaining compensation under the Act by having agreed to accept the provisions of a scheme certified under the Act of 1897, but which had not been re-certified under the Act of 1906. Wallace v. Hawthorne, Leslie, & Co., Limited, March 7, 1908, p. 713.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 4 (1)—Subcontracting—Work "undertaken" by the Principal.

A firm of chemical manufacturers contracted with a certain person to tar the outside of tanks used in their business to protect them from the weather, and a workman in the employment of the contractor was killed by an accident while engaged on the works. In a claim for compensation by the workman's widow, held that the work of tarring the tanks was not part of the work "undertaken" by the chemical manufacturers, within the meaning of sec. 4 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and that they were not liable to pay compensation. Zugg v. J. & J. Cunningham, Limited, May 14, 1908, p. 827.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 7 (2)—Seaman—Fishing Vessel—Remuneration by share in profits or gross earnings.

The sole remuneration of the mate or first fisherman of a steam-trawler while at sea was one and one-eighth share (each share being one-fourteenth) of the net balance of the gross price of the fish caught on a trip after deducting certain specified expenses, which did not include the wages of other members of the crew who were paid by fixed wages. Held that such remuneration was a share in the profits or the gross earnings of the vessel, and that the fisherman so paid fell under the exception contained in sec. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and was consequently precluded from claiming compensation under that Act. Gill v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited, Dec. 14, 1907, p. 328.

A widow who had five sons, working miners, four of whom were married and had children, lived with and was entirely supported by her unmarried son. In a claim at her instance for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of the death of the son who supported her, held that notwithstanding her right to relief from the four other sons, who were able to contribute to her support, she was wholly dependent upon the earnings of the deceased at the time of his death within the meaning of the Act. Rintoul v. Dalmeny Oil Co., Limited, June 25, 1908, p. 1025.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 13—Casual Employment—Employment for the purposes of the employer's trade or business.

A jobbing window cleaner was in use about once a month to clean the windows of the house of a medical practitioner, who used a portion of the house in connection with his professional practice. There was no formal contract between the parties, and the window cleaner called and did the work without receiving on each occasion a special invitation or special permission to do so. On one occasion while cleaning the window of the dining-room he fell and was injured. Held that the window cleaner's employment was of a casual nature, and that he was not employed for the purposes of the employer's trade or business, and that he was, therefore, not entitled to compensation. Rennie v. Reid, July 3, 1908, p. 1051.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule, (1) (a) (i.)—Claim by Dependant's Executor.

30. Held that the right to compensation, conferred by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, on the dependant of a deceased workman, vests in the dependant on the death of the workman, and transmits to the representatives of the dependant, although the dependant may have made no claim for compensation during his lifetime. Hendry v. United Collieries Limited, July 18, 1908, p. 1215.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule (1) (a)—Death of Workman—Amount of Compensation—Dependant—Sum "reasonable and proportionate to the injury."

31. In an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, for the death of a workman, the arbitrator found that an illegitimate pupil child of the deceased, for whose support the deceased had been paying aliment under a decree of affiliation and aliment, was partially dependent on his earnings, and that the sum available for compensation under the Act was £150. No other dependant having applied for compensation, the arbitrator awarded the whole sum of £150, less £5, 10s. of funeral expenses, to the illegitimate child. Held, on an appeal, that in making the award the arbitrator had proceeded on a wrong principle, in respect that the Act does not provide for the maximum sum being awarded in every case, but only for an award of reasonable compensation within that limit; and case remitted to him to ascertain the prospective value of the contributions that would probably have been made by the deceased, if he had lived, for the support of his illegitimate child. Murray v. Gourlay, March 17, 1908, p. 769.

32. Opinion, per curiam, that reasonable funeral expenses are a proper charge on the fund available for compensation. Murray v. Gourlay, March 17, 1908, p. 769.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule, (1) (b) and (2) (a) and (c)—Amount of Compensation—"Average Weekly Earnings"—Mode of Computation.

33. In ascertaining the amount of the average weekly earnings of a workman entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the leading canon is, as stated in sec. 2 (a) of the First Schedule, that "average weekly earnings shall be computed in such manner as is best calculated to give the rate per week at which the workman was being remunerated." Carter v. Lang & Sons, July 17, 1908, p. 1198.
34. In an ordinary case the average weekly earnings of a workman entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, are to be ascertained by dividing the total amount earned during the relevant period of his employment by the number of weeks actually worked within that period, and, if there are regularly recurring trade holidays when no work can be done, by deducting from the result thus obtained a fraction equal to the fraction of the year during which for this reason no wages can be earned. Carter v. Lang & Sons, July 17, 1908, p. 1198.
35. In ascertaining the average weekly earnings of a workman the question whether those days in any week on which the workman was absent from work are to be disregarded depends on the nature of the employment, and in an employment where it is customary to work for only a limited number of days in the week, the amount earned in

Carter v. Lang & Sons, July 17, 1908, p. 1198.

In the application of sec. 2 (c) of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, "absence from work due to illness or any other unavoidable cause" means absence from work due to a cause personal to the workman, as distinguished from causes due to the work, such as trade holidays or an accidental stoppage of machinery. Carter v. Lang & Sons, July 17, 1908, p. 1198.

The question whether, in view of the shortness of the employment or of the other considerations indicated in sec. 2 (a) of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, it is practicable to compute the rate of remuneration at the date of the accident from the facts of the workman's own employment, is a question of fact for the determination of the arbitrator, and is to be settled in each case by a consideration of the whole circumstances of the employment. Carter v. Lang & Sons, July 17, 1908, p. 1198.

A workman who had been incapacitated by accident, and who was entitled to compensation, had been at the date of the accident for thirteen weeks in his employment. During that period he had earned for one week nothing, and for another week very little, on account of illness, and again for one week had earned nothing, and for another week very little, on account of trade holidays. The arbitrator calculated his average weekly earnings by dividing his total earnings by thirteen. In an appeal by stated case, the Court enunciated certain general rules for the computation of a workman's average weekly earnings for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, recalled the determination of the arbitrator, and remitted to him to proceed. Carter v. Lang & Sons, July 17, 1908, p. 1198.

orkmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule (16)—Review of Weekly Payments—Payments under unrecorded Verbal Agreement—Date from which Payments may be Ended, Diminished, or Increased.

Employers, who were paying compensation to a workman under an unrecorded verbal agreement, presented an application on 21st December 1907 under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule (16) to have the payments reviewed, and the compensation ended as at 1st November 1907, on the ground that incapacity had then ceased. The arbitrator found it proved that the workman's incapacity ceased on 1st November 1907, and on 29th January 1908 pronounced an interlocutor ending the payments from the date of the interlocutor. In an appeal on a stated case, held that as there was no recorded agreement, the compensation fell to be ended as from the date when incapacity ceased, and not from the date of the application for review, or the date of the arbitrator's decision. PASSIVE TITLE. Vitious Intromission—Onus.

A farmer, after the death of his uncle who lodged with him and assisted him on the farm, took from his uncle's repositories a cheque in his uncle's favour for £46, and in exchange for it got from the granter a cheque in his own favour. In an action by a creditor of the uncle against the nephew as a vitious intromitter with the uncle's estate, after a proof, the Court held (1) that the uncle had no interest in the stock of the farm, and that the cheque represented the price of three bulls, part of the stock sold by him in the management of the farm, (2) that the pursuer had failed to prove that the uncle had any claim against the farm which would have entitled him to retain the cheque, and (3) that the defender was not liable as a vitious intromitter even to the extent of the sum in the cheque. Opinion (per Lord Low) that, even if the uncle had been joint owner of the bulls along with the nephew, the nephew, by acting as he did with regard to the cheque, would not have made himself liable as a vitious intromitter. *Greig v. et—Private Street—Railway—Road forming “part of any railway” —Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 4 (31).

An unformed road in a burgh, 40 feet in width, was bounded on one side by a line of railway from which it was separated by a wall. The solum of the road ex adverso of the railway to the extent of 30 feet of its width was the property of the railway company, who had acquired it by voluntary disposition under a power to purchase land for extraordinary purposes. Over the road there existed a public right of way for traffic of every description. Held that the road was not “part of a railway” in the sense of sec. 4 (31) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, but was a private street within the meaning of the Burgh Police Acts. *Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Held that notwithstanding the provisions of the Burgh Sewerage, Drainage, and Water Supply Act, 1901, it is competent for the town-council of a burgh, as sewerage authority in the burgh, (1) to carry out drainage operations in the burgh under the powers conferred by the 103d section of the Public Health Act, 1897, and (2) to do so without following the procedure or being subject to the conditions imposed by the Burgh Police Act, 1892. *Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. The wife went to reside in Paisley, and in April 1902 received parochial relief from Paisley. Row reimbursed Paisley for the advances made. After doing so for two and a half years Row repudiated further liability, on the ground that the husband had lost his settlement in that parish by non-residence for the statutory period of three years, and that his wife's settlement, which was derived from him, had lapsed also. In an action by the relieving parish against Row and against the Parish Council of Glasgow, held that the wife was the pauper; that her settlement remained unchanged during chargeability; and that Row was still liable for her support. *Parish Council of Paisley v. 3. The Lunatics (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 75, enacts:—"Every pauper lunatic detained in any district asylum under this Act shall be deemed and held to belong and be chargeable to the parish of the legal settlement of such lunatic at the time the order for his reception in such asylum was granted, and the expense of his maintenance in such district asylum shall be defrayed by such parish accordingly, and the residence of any pauper lunatic in any such district asylum shall be deemed to be the residence of such lunatic in the parish legally chargeable with the maintenance of such lunatic." A lunatic who was born in the parish of Parton, and who had, on 15th August 1895, a residential settlement in the parish of Kelton, was admitted to an asylum in another parish as a pauper lunatic on that date. For a few months after her admission she was maintained by the parish of Kelton. For the next ten years she was maintained by her brother in the same asylum as a private patient, and her name taken off the poor's-roll. Thereafter her brother ceased to contribute to her support, and she again fell upon the rates, being detained in the same asylum under the order granted when she was first admitted. In a question between the parish of Kelton, who contended that she had lost her residential settlement by non-residence during the period when she was a private patient, and the parish of Parton, who contended that her settlement remained the same as at the date of her admission, held that the lunatic had not lost her residential settlement, and that she was chargeable to the parish of Kelton as the parish of her settlement at the time when the order for her reception was granted. Rigg v. Bell, June 12, 1908, p. 974.

In 1671 Charles Maitland of Hatton raised an action in the Court of Session concluding for declarator, inter alia, that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland, and called John Scrymgeour as a defender. John Scrymgeour appeared, and, after stating certain defences, was allowed to withdraw from the action, and in his absence decree was pronounced in favour of the pursuer as concluded for. In 1902 an action was raised in the Court of Session at the instance of the Earl of Lauderdale, also concluding for declarator that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer. The pursuer claimed as in right of his ancestor, Charles Maitland, and founded, inter alia, on the decree of 1671. The action was defended by Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, a descendant of John Scrymgeour. Held that in respect of the operation of the negative prescription, and of sec. 24 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, the decree of 1671 could not now be impugned, and that the pursuer, as in right of the decree, was entitled to the office. *Earl of Lauderdale v. After the daughter attained majority the factor continued to act as her agent and to manage for her her income from the estate. Subsequently an action was brought against the daughter at the instance of the tutors and curators and of the factor, of which the conclusions were (1) for payment to the tutors and curators of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by them to her during the subsistence of the curatory, and (2) for payment to the factor of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by him to her after the termination of the curatory. Held that the action as raised was incompetent, in respect that it was at the instance of unconnected pursuers each suing for a separate debt. *Paxton v. The arbiters having issued an award, the tenant, being dissatisfied with the amount awarded, brought a reduction, setting forth various grounds of reduction. At the proof it appeared from the evidence of the arbiters that they had fixed the sum awarded on the principle of taking the landlord's obligation as the obligation of an outgoing tenant, and not as the obligation of a landlord. This was not averred either by the pursuer or by the defender, and was not, until the proof, known to the pursuer. Held that the absence of any averment by the pursuer did not bar him from taking the objection that the arbiters had not determined the question submitted to them. *Davidson v. Admissibility of Parole Proof—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 100.

2. Held that where bills were granted in implement of a written agreement, the terms of this agreement could not be modified by parole evidence. Stagg & Robson, Limited, v. Stirling, Feb. 28, 1908, p. 675.

PROPERTY. Gable—Boundary—Building Condition—Encroachment.

In erecting a four-storey house, Pottinger obtained the permission of the neighbouring proprietor, Wilson, to build upon the gable wall of an adjoining two-storey house belonging to Wilson. The wall in question was only 9½ inches thick, and in order to satisfy the requirement of the Dean of Guild that the thickness of the added portion should be 14 inches, the added portion was built in such a manner that, while it was flush with the original on the side next Pottinger's property, it projected 4½ inches beyond the wall on Wilson's side. After the building operations were completed, Wilson raised an action concluding (1) for declarator that Pottinger had illegally encroached on his property, and (2) for removal of the encroachment. The Court dismissed the action, per the Lord President on the ground that Wilson had by signing plans consented to the encroachment, and per Lord McLaren and Lord Kinnear on the ground that, when Wilson gave permission to build on his gable wall, the agreement was subject to the implied condition that the building was to be in such form as the Dean of Guild should direct, that it had been erected in accordance with his directions, and that accordingly there had been no unlawful encroachment. Wilson v. Pottinger, Feb. 7, 1908, p. 580.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Sale of Food and Drugs—Delivery of milk in several cans—Deficiency of quality in each can—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, secs. 6, 13—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 3.

1. Samples having been taken from fourteen out of sixteen cans of milk in course of delivery in one consignment, and all the samples having been found deficient in quality, the consignor was charged with and convicted of fourteen offences under sec. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. Held that, there having been only one delivery, it was incompetent to charge and convict of more than one offence. Telford v. Fyfe, July 16, 1908, (J.) p. 83.

Sale of Food and Drugs—Milk in course of delivery—Fair Sample—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 3.

2. A consignment of milk was delivered in sixteen cans which were cylindrical in shape and about two feet deep. Each can was taken into a store-room by the consignor's servant, where it was opened by him. An inspector of nuisances then agitated the milk in the can with a wooden spoon about a foot in length, and a sample was taken by dipping a measure into the milk just under the surface and removing about fourteen ounces. Samples were thus taken from fourteen cans. The milk in the cans was on delivery poured into a large vat in the store-room. Opinion that the method of sampling was not unfair or improper, and that it afforded a fair test of the contents of each can; and, further, that it would have been incompetent to take a sample after delivery into the vat, the milk being then no longer in course of delivery. Telford v. Fyfe, July 16, 1908, (J.) p. 83.

Sale of Food and Drugs—Prosecutions by officers of Local Government Board and Board of Agriculture as private purchasers—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, secs. 6, 12, 14, 20—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, secs. 2 (1) (2), 3 (2) (3), 23, 24.

3. The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, confers on the Local Government Board and the Board of Agriculture, and the corresponding boards in Scotland and Ireland, powers, in default of action by the Local Authority, to institute proceedings at the instance of their officers against persons infringing the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, and prescribes procedure to be followed in such prosecutions. Held that the exercise of these powers was optional and not obligatory; that the officers of these boards were entitled to institute proceedings as private individuals in the method prescribed by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875; and that they were not limited in prosecutions at their instance to the procedure prescribed by the Act of 1899. Falconer v. Whyte, March 20, 1908, (J.) p. 40. See Police, 5-8.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Public-House Offences—Breach of Certificate—Third offence—Proof—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, secs. 53, 91, 102, and 103.

1. A publican who had been convicted of breach of certificate, upon a complaint bearing that it was a "third offence," brought a suspension upon the ground that (after evidence for the prosecution and the defence had been led, the cases for the respective parties closed, and parties heard with regard to the particular breach alleged, and after the justices had found the accused guilty thereof), a witness was put in to prove two previous convictions against the accused; that this evidence was incompetently admitted; that no other evidence of the offence charged being a third offence had been led; and that such evidence should have been led, as this was a substantive part of the charge. Held that the procedure complained of amounted to nothing more at most than a "deviation in point of form from the statutory enactment," that consequently the only form of review competent was an appeal under sec. 102 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, and that the suspension was incompetent. Opinions that the procedure followed by the Justices was competent and proper. Mitchell v. Morrison, May 13, 1908, (J.) p. 65.

Public-House Offences—Sale of exciseable liquors to children—Responsibility of Publican for assistant—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, sec. 59.

2. Under sec. 59 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, every holder of a certificate who knowingly sells or delivers, or allows any person to sell or deliver, exciseable liquors to any person under fourteen years of age, except in corked or sealed vessels in quantities not less than one pint, is guilty of an offence. Exciseable liquors in quantities less than one pint were sold in open vessels to a girl of eleven years of age by a publican's assistant, who had means of knowing the age of the child. The sale took place outwith the publican's presence and actual personal knowledge, but no sufficient instructions had been given by him to his assistant not to supply children under fourteen years of age with exciseable liquors except as provided by sec. 59 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903. Held that the publican had been rightly convicted of a contravention of that section. Greig v. Macleod, Dec. 4, 1907, (J.) p. 14.

RAILWAY. Construction and Maintenance—Questions with Local Authorities—Bridge carrying highway over railway—"Public Highway"—Maintenance of Road—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 39.

enacts that where a line of railway crosses "any turnpike road or public highway," and the road is carried over the railway by means of a bridge, such bridge and the approaches thereto "shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the [railway] company." Held that the words "public highway" applied only to roads which were public de jure. Corporation of Glasgow v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 29, 1907, p. 244.

Construction and Maintenance—Questions with Local Authorities—Road—Bridge over Railway—Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872, secs. 4, 26.

2. The Caledonian Railway Act, 1872, sec. 4, enacts that the Company "may make and maintain" certain railways, and "may execute the other works and operations hereinafter mentioned." With reference to one of the railways authorised, which crossed a certain road, sec. 26 enacts:—"In constructing railway No. 2 the following provisions shall be binding on the Company, who shall construct the works hereinafter specified in manner hereinafter directed . . . (3) the road . . . shall be carried over the railway by a bridge not less than 40 feet wide." The railway company by virtue of the powers conferred on them by secs. 4 and 26 of the foregoing special Act, constructed railway No. 2, and, where it crossed the road, carried the road over the railway by means of a bridge. Held that since the section of the special Act providing for the construction of the bridge did not specify that the road upon it was to be maintained by the railway company, no such duty lay upon it under the provisions of that Act. Corporation of Glasgow v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 29, 1907, p. 244.

Construction and Maintenance—Questions with Third Parties—Road forming "part of any railway"—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 4 (31).

3. An unfenced road in a burgh, 40 feet in width, was bounded on one side by a line of railway from which it was separated by a wall. The solum of the road ex adverso of the railway to the extent of 30 feet of its width was the property of the railway company, who had acquired it by voluntary disposition under a power to purchase land for extraordinary purposes. Over the road there existed a public right of way for traffic of every description. Held that the road was not "part of a railway" in the sense of sec. 4 (31) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, but was a private street within the meaning of that Act. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Hutchison, Feb. 19, 1908, p. 587.

Construction and Maintenance—Questions between Companies—Siding—Renewal of Siding—Identity of Subject—Running Powers—Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865, sec. 15.

4. The Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865, conferred on certain railway companies running powers over the sidings of the railways vested by the Act in the Caledonian Railway, "constructed at the time of the commencement of this Act, or any renewals thereof." Circumstances connected with the construction of a siding in which held that the siding in question was a renewal of a siding in existence at the commencement of the Act. North British Railway Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., Oct. 18, 1907, p. 16.

Traffic and Carriage—Passengers—Injuries to Passengers—Failure of railway servants to close carriage doors before setting train in motion.

Traffic and Carriage—Passengers—Injuries to Passengers—Crowd on Station Platform.

6. Circumstances in which held that the injuries of a woman who had been pushed off a railway platform by a crowd were not due to negligence on the part of the Railway Company. M'Callum v. North British Railway Co., Jan. 14, 1908, p. 415.

Traffic and Carriage—Passengers—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 96—Travelling without paying fare—Intent to avoid payment.

7. A workman, who had travelled by a workman's train, attempted to leave the station where he alighted without giving up a ticket (his intention being to defraud the railway company), but was prevented from doing so, and thereupon produced from his pocket and tendered a workman's ticket valid and available for the journey. Workmen's tickets are not dated, and can be used at any time. Held that the workman had not been guilty of travelling "without having previously paid his fare and with intent to avoid payment thereof" in the sense of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 96. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Roper, May 13, 1908, (J.) p. 69.

Traffic and Carriage—Goods—Agreements with Traders—Owner of cattle undertaking risk of carriage if sent by route specified—Damage sustained on different route—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, sec. 7—Limitation of Company's Liability.

8. A railway company agreed with the owner of three head of cattle consigned by rail from Maxton Station to Alnwick, via Kelso, for exhibition at a cattle show at Alnwick, that if they were not sold they should be taken back to Maxton at half fare, provided the owner consigned them by the same route as that by which they had been sent, and undertook the risk of their conveyance. Between Kelso and Alnwick there were two railway routes equally convenient, one by Wooler, the other by Tweedmouth. The Railway Company sent the cattle to Alnwick by the Wooler route. The cattle were not sold at the show, and the owner's agent in sending them back from Alnwick Station signed a consignment note bearing that they were sent for carriage back to Maxton "by the same route as on the journey here, at the reduced rate," "and in consideration of your charging such reduced rate," "the undersigned agrees to free and relieve you of all liability" for loss or damage, unless caused by wilful misconduct on the part of their servants. The Railway Company chose to send the cattle back by the Tweedmouth route and they were destroyed by fire at Tweedmouth Junction. In an action brought by the owner of the cattle against the Railway Company for £800 as the value of the cattle the defenders maintained (1) that they were not liable, as they had sent them back by the route contracted for, viz., by Kelso; (2) that the stipulation that they should be returned by the same route was a stipulation solely for their own benefit, and conferred no right on the sender of the cattle; (3) that in any view their liability was restricted to £15 for each animal, in respect that no declaration of an excess value was made on behalf of the owner in terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, sec. 7. Held (1) that the Railway Company had broken the contract, and could not found on the indemnity clause therein, but (2) that their liability for the loss of the cattle was limited to £15 per animal. Lord Polwarth v. North British Railway Co., Nov. 15, 1907, p. 1275. See Stamp, 2-4—Valuation Acts, 1.

Liability of master for wrongful act of servant—Wrongous Detention.

2. A lady who had been a guest at a hydropathic establishment, brought an action of damages against the proprietors of the Hydropathic, in which she averred that when she was at the Hydropathic she went, at the request of the defenders' manager, to his private room; that she there found a Mr and Mrs R., who were fellow guests; that Mrs R. had conceived an ill-will against the pursuer, and that the defenders' manager knew this; that Mr and Mrs R. placed themselves against the door to prevent the pursuer from leaving the room; that the manager said that he would not allow the pursuer to leave the room until she apologised to Mrs R. for slamming a door in her face—"a thing the pursuer had never done"—and that the manager aided and abetted Mr and Mrs R. in preventing the pursuer from leaving the room for about fifteen minutes. The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant in respect that the pursuer's averments shewed that the manager was not, on the occasion in question, acting within the scope of his employment. Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant. Mackenzie v. Cluny Hill Hydropathic Co., Limited, Nov. 23, 1907, p. 200.

Liability of master for slander uttered by servant.

3. Held that an employer is liable for a verbal slander uttered by his servant in the course of the servant's employment and for the benefit of the master. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, June 9, 1908, p. 928.
4. In an action of damages for slander brought by a married woman against a limited liability company as the owners of a theatre, the pursuer averred that while she was witnessing a performance in the defenders' theatre the defenders' servants falsely stated, within the hearing of her husband and others, that she was a notorious prostitute who had been thrown out of the theatre two weeks previously for being drunk and disorderly, and said that she must leave the theatre; and that the statements complained of were made by the defenders' servants in the course of their service and for the defenders' benefit. The pursuer referred for its terms to a bye-law, made under statutory authority, founded on by the defenders, which was applicable to the theatre, and which provided that the licensed manager should not permit men or women of bad fame to enter the theatre. Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, June 9, 1908, p. 928.
5. In an action of damages for slander brought by a married man against a limited liability company, as the owners of a theatre, the pursuer averred that while he and his wife were witnessing a performance in the defenders' theatre the under-manager falsely stated that the pursuer's wife was a bad character and must leave the theatre, that on the pursuer explaining that the lady was his wife, the under-manager replied that "he had heard that story before," and that the under-manager subsequently falsely stated to the manager of the theatre that the pursuer's wife was a notorious prostitute who had two weeks previously been thrown out of the theatre for being drunk and disorderly. The pursuer further averred that the statements complained of were made of and concerning him, and represented that he was a person of loose and immoral habits and character, act as her tutors and curators. At the time of his death his daughter was in pupillarity, and his executors acted as her tutors and curators, and appointed a law-agent as factor for the purpose of managing the estate. After the daughter attained majority the factor continued to act as her agent and to manage for her her income from the estate. Subsequently an action was brought against the daughter at the instance of the tutors and curators and of the factor, of which the conclusions were (1) for payment to the tutors and curators of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by them to her during the subsistence of the curatory, and (2) for payment to the factor of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by him to her after the termination of the curatory. Held that the action as raised was incompetent, in respect that it was at the instance of unconnected pursuers each suing for a separate debt. Paxton v. Brown, Jan. 14, 1908, p. 406.

Summons—Conclusions—Joint and Several Liability.

2. In an action of payment against six defenders "jointly and severally," three of the defenders were assolizied. Held that a decree against the remaining defenders conjunctly and severally was competent. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

Citation—Corporation—Citation of Corporation by citing its members.

3. A corporation was cited by calling its members by name, as representing the corporation but not as individuals. The majority of the corporation resolved to defend the action. Held that they were entitled to lodge defences in name of the whole members as representing the corporation. Eadie v. Glasgow Corporation, Nov. 21, 1907, p. 207.

Record—Averments—Ground of action not averred on record and disclosed to pursuer by the evidence for the defender at the proof.

4. The proprietor of a farm in his own occupation having let it on lease, the landlord and the tenant entered into a submission as to the amount payable by the landlord under an obligation to put the buildings in "tenantable condition and repair." The arbiters having issued an award, the tenant, being dissatisfied with the amount awarded, brought a reduction, setting forth various grounds of reduction. At the proof it appeared from the evidence of the arbiters that they had fixed the sum awarded on the principle of taking the landlord's obligation as the obligation of an outgoing tenant, and not as the obligation of a landlord. This was not averred either by the pursuer or by the defender, and was not, until the proof, known to the pursuer. Held that the absence of any averment by the pursuer did not bar him from taking the objection that the arbiters had not determined the question submitted to them. Davidson v. Logan, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 350.

Record—Printing and Lodging—Failure to lodge prints—A. S., Nov. 2, 1872, sec. 5.

The summons having been held to be incompetent in respect that it was at the instance of unconnected pursuers each suing for a separate debt, held that it could be competently amended by striking out one set of pursuers; and amendment to that effect allowed. Paxton v. Brown, Jan. 14, 1908, p. 406.

Disclaimer.

7. A corporation was cited by calling its members by name, as representing the corporation but not as individuals. The majority of the corporation resolved to defend the action. Held that they were entitled to lodge defences in name of the whole members as representing the corporation, and that dissenting members were not entitled to disclaim the defences. Eadie v. Glasgow Corporation, Nov. 21, 1907, p. 207.

Appointment of curator ad litem—Minor defender not appearing.

8. It is not competent on the motion of a pursuer to appoint a curator ad litem to a minor defender who has not appeared in the action. This rule applies in the case of a multiplepounding. Mackenzie's Trustees v. Mackenzie, June 17, 1908, p. 995.

Preliminary Defences—All parties not called—Claim against general estate of testator—Competency of suing individual legatee.

9. Held that an individual legatee cannot be called upon to discuss the validity of a claim against the testator's estate, which may or may not affect his legacy, in an action to which the general representatives of the testator have not been made parties. *Gillespie v. 10. In an action of accounting the defenders stated preliminary pleas in which they denied their liability to account. The Lord Ordinary in the Procedure-roll pronounced an interlocutor appointing the defenders "before answer" to lodge the account called for in the summons. Held that the interlocutor did not "import an appointment of proof or a refusal or postponement of the same," within the meaning of the Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870, and that consequently it could not be reclaimed against without leave. Lamont & Co. v. Dublin and Glasgow Steam Packet Co., June 23, 1908, p. 1017.

The proprietor brought an action for removal of the pipes. Held that the proprietor was not entitled to have the sewer-pipes removed, and the river bed restored to the condition in which it existed prior to the operations, in respect that, if the pipes were removed as demanded, he could not prevent the Local Authority, if they thereafter gave reasonable notice, from replacing the pipes in the same position. *Montgomerie & Co., Limited, v. Most of the machines exhibited pictures or produced music by phonographic records; a few told fortunes, gave electric shocks, or recorded weight or strength. The doors were always open during business hours, and admission was free. Held that the entertainment was a "public show" within the meaning of sec. 7 of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892. *Allan v. Settlement—Derivative Settlement—Loss of—Deserted Wife—Nothing known as to Husband.

2. W., who was born in the parish of Glasgow and had a residential settlement in the parish of Row, in October 1901 deserted his wife and children, and was not heard of again. The wife went to reside in Paisley, and in April 1902 received parochial relief from Paisley. Row reimbursed Paisley for the advances made. After doing so for two and a half years Row repudiated further liability, on the ground that the husband had lost his settlement in that parish by non-residence for the statutory period of three years, and that his wife's settlement, which was derived from him, had lapsed also. In an action by the relieving parish against Row and against the Parish Council of Glasgow, held that the wife was the pauper; that her settlement remained unchanged during chargeability; and that Row was still liable for her support. Parish Council of Paisley v. Parish Councils of Row and Glasgow, March 11, 1908, p. 731.

Lunatic—Residential Settlement—Retention—Lunatics (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 75.

The Lunatics (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 75, enacts:—"Every pauper lunatic detained in any district asylum under this Act shall be deemed and held to belong and be chargeable to the parish of the legal settlement of such lunatic at the time the order for his reception in such asylum was granted, and the expense of his maintenance in such district asylum shall be defrayed by such parish accordingly, and the residence of any pauper lunatic in any such district asylum shall be deemed to be the residence of such lunatic in the parish legally chargeable with the maintenance of such lunatic."

A lunatic who was born in the parish of Parton, and who had, on 15th August 1895, a residential settlement in the parish of Kelton, was admitted to an asylum in another parish as a pauper lunatic on that date. For a few months after her admission she was maintained by the parish of Kelton. For the next ten years she was maintained by her brother in the same asylum as a private patient, and her name taken off the poor's-roll. Thereafter her brother ceased to contribute to her support, and she again fell upon the rates, being detained in the same asylum under the order granted when she was first admitted. In a question between the parish of Kelton, who contended that she had lost her residential settlement by non-residence during the period when she was a private patient, and the parish of Parton, who contended that her settlement remained the same as at the date of her admission, held that the lunatic had not lost her residential settlement, and that she was chargeable to the parish of Kelton as the parish of her settlement at the time when the order for her reception was granted. Rigg v. Bell, June 12, 1908, p. 974.

1671 Charles Maitland of Hatton raised an action in the Court of Session concluding for declarator, inter alia, that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland, and called John Scrymgeour as a defender. John Scrymgeour appeared, and, after stating certain defences, was allowed to withdraw from the action, and in his absence decree was pronounced in favour of the pursuer as concluded for. In 1902 an action was raised in the Court of Session at the instance of the Earl of Lauderdale, also concluding for declarator that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer. The pursuer claimed as in right of his ancestor, Charles Maitland, and founded, inter alia, on the decree of 1671. The action was defended by Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, a descendant of John Scrymgeour. Held that in respect of the operation of the negative prescription, and of sec. 24 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, the decree of 1671 could not now be impugned, and that the pursuer, as in right of the decree, was entitled to the office. Earl of Lauderdale v. Wedderburn, July 18, 1908, p. 1237.

act as her tutors and curators. At the time of his death his daughter was in pupillarity, and his executors acted as her tutors and curators, and appointed a law-agent as factor for the purpose of managing the estate. After the daughter attained majority the factor continued to act as her agent and to manage for her her income from the estate. Subsequently an action was brought against the daughter at the instance of the tutors and curators and of the factor, of which the conclusions were (1) for payment to the tutors and curators of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by them to her during the subsistence of the curatory, and (2) for payment to the factor of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by him to her after the termination of the curatory. Held that the action as raised was incompetent, in respect that it was at the instance of unconnected pursuers each suing for a separate debt. Paxton v. Brown, Jan. 14, 1908, p. 406.

Summons—Conclusions—Joint and Several Liability.

2. In an action of payment against six defenders "jointly and severally," three of the defenders were assoilzied. Held that a decree against the remaining defenders conjunctly and severally was competent. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

Citation—Corporation—Citation of Corporation by citing its members.

3. A corporation was cited by calling its members by name, as representing the corporation but not as individuals. The majority of the corporation resolved to defend the action. Held that they were entitled to lodge defences in name of the whole members as representing the corporation. Eadie v. Glasgow Corporation, Nov. 21, 1907, p. 207.

Record—Averments—Ground of action not averred on record and disclosed to pursuer by the evidence for the defender at the proof.

4. The proprietor of a farm in his own occupation having let it on lease, the landlord and the tenant entered into a submission as to the amount payable by the landlord under an obligation to put the buildings in "tenantable condition and repair." The arbiters having issued an award, the tenant, being dissatisfied with the amount awarded, brought a reduction, setting forth various grounds of reduction. At the proof it appeared from the evidence of the arbiters that they had fixed the sum awarded on the principle of taking the landlord's obligation as the obligation of an outgoing tenant, and not as the obligation of a landlord. This was not averred either by the pursuer or by the defender, and was not, until the proof, known to the pursuer. Held that the absence of any averment by the pursuer did not bar him from taking the objection that the arbiters had not determined the question submitted to them. Davidson v. Logan, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 350.

state. After the daughter attained majority the factor continued to act as her agent and to manage for her her income from the estate. Subsequently an action was brought against the daughter at the instance of the tutors and curators and of the factor, of which the conclusions were (1) for payment to the tutors and curators of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by them to her during the subsistence of the curatory, and (2) for payment to the factor of certain sums alleged to have been overpaid by him to her after the termination of the curatory. The summons having been held to be incompetent in respect that it was at the instance of unconnected pursuers each suing for a separate debt, held that it could be competently amended by striking out one set of pursuers; and amendment to that effect allowed. Paxton v. Brown, Jan. 14, 1908, p. 406.

Disclaimer.

A corporation was cited by calling its members by name, as representing the corporation but not as individuals. The majority of the corporation resolved to defend the action. Held that they were entitled to lodge defences in name of the whole members as representing the corporation, and that dissenting members were not entitled to disclaim the defences. Eadie v. Glasgow Corporation, Nov. 21, 1907, p. 207.

Appointment of curator ad litem—Minor defender not appearing.

It is not competent on the motion of a pursuer to appoint a curator ad litem to a minor defender who has not appeared in the action. This rule applies in the case of a multiplepinding. Mackenzie's Trustees v. Mackenzie, June 17, 1908, p. 995.

Preliminary Defences—All parties not called—Claim against general estate of testator—Competency of suing individual legatee.

Held that an individual legatee cannot be called upon to discuss the validity of a claim against the testator's estate, which may or may not affect his legacy, in an action to which the general representatives of the testator have not been made parties. *Gillespie v. In an action of accounting the defenders stated preliminary pleas in which they denied their liability to account. The Lord Ordinary in the Procedure-roll pronounced an interlocutor appointing the defenders "before answer" to lodge the account called for in the summons. Held that the interlocutor did not "import an appointment of proof or a refusal or postponement of the same," within the meaning of the Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870, and that consequently it could not be reclaimed against without leave. *Lamont & Co. v. 14. In 1671 Charles Maitland of Hatton raised an action in the Court of Session concluding for declarator, inter alia, that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland, and called John Scrymgeour as a defender. John Scrymgeour appeared, and, after stating certain defences, was allowed to withdraw from the action, and in his absence decree was pronounced in favour of the pursuer as concluded for. In 1902 an action was raised in the Court of Session at the instance of the Earl of Lauderdale also concluding for declarator that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer. The pursuer claimed as in right of his ancestor, Charles Maitland, and founded, inter alia, on the decree of 1671. The action was defended by Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, a descendant of John Scrymgeour. Held that in respect of the operation of the negative prescription, and of sec. 24 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, the decree of 1671 could not now be impugned, and that the pursuer, as in right of the decree, was entitled to the office. *Earl of Lauderdale v. Proof—Proof or Jury Trial—Discretion of Lord Ordinary—Action of Damages—Special Cause—Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1866, sec. 4.

15. In an action of damages at the instance of a father as tutor of his pupil child about five years of age, who had sustained personal injuries through being run over by a tramway car, the Lord Ordinary refused to send the case to a jury and allowed a proof, stating as his grounds for doing so that the case was of doubtful relevancy, and that it raised a question as to contributory negligence, which in the case of a child was always of a delicate nature, and also questions depending upon expert evidence as to the construction of tramway cars. The Court refused to interfere with what the Lord Ordinary had done in the exercise of his discretion as to the mode of trial. *Cass v. ERTY. Gable—Boundary—Building Condition—Encroachment.

In erecting a four-storey house, Pottinger obtained the permission of the neighbouring proprietor, Wilson, to build upon the gable wall of an adjoining two-storey house belonging to Wilson. The wall in question was only 9½ inches thick, and in order to satisfy the requirement of the Dean of Guild that the thickness of the added portion should be 14 inches, the added portion was built in such a manner that, while it was flush with the original on the side next Pottinger's property, it projected 4½ inches beyond the wall on Wilson's side. After the building operations were completed, Wilson raised an action concluding (1) for declarator that Pottinger had illegally encroached on his property, and (2) for removal of the encroachment. The Court dismissed the action, per the Lord President on the ground that Wilson had by signing plans consented to the encroachment, and per Lord McLaren and Lord Kinnear on the ground that, when Wilson gave permission to build on his gable wall, the agreement was subject to the implied condition that the building was to be in such form as the Dean of Guild should direct, that it had been erected in accordance with his directions, and that accordingly there had been no unlawful encroachment. Wilson v. Pottinger, Feb. 7, 1908, p. 580.

LIC HEALTH. Sale of Food and Drugs—Delivery of milk in several cans—Deficiency of quality in each can—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, secs. 6, 13—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 3.

Samples having been taken from fourteen out of sixteen cans of milk in course of delivery in one consignment, and all the samples having been found deficient in quality, the consignor was charged with and convicted of fourteen offences under sec. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. Held that, there having been only one delivery, it was incompetent to charge and convict of more than one offence. Telford v. Fyfe, July 16, 1908, (J.) p. 83.

ale of Food and Drugs—Milk in course of delivery—Fair Sample—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, sec. 3.

A consignment of milk was delivered in sixteen cans which were cylindrical in shape and about two feet deep. Each can was taken into a store-room by the consignor's servant, where it was opened by him. An inspector of nuisances then agitated the milk in the can with a wooden spoon about a foot in length, and a sample was taken by dipping a measure into the milk just under the surface and removing about fourteen ounces. Samples were thus taken from fourteen cans. The milk in the cans was on delivery poured into a large vat in the store-room. Opinion that the method of sampling was not unfair or improper, and that it afforded a fair test of the contents of each can; and, further, that it would have been incompetent to take a sample after delivery into the vat, the milk being then no longer in course of delivery. Telford v. Fyfe, July 16, 1908, (J.) p. 83.

Sale of Food and Drugs—Prosecutions by officers of Local Government Board and Board of Agriculture as private purchasers—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, secs. 6, 12, 14, 20—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, secs. 2 (1) (2), 3 (2) (3), 23, 24.

3. The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, confers on the Local Government Board and the Board of Agriculture, and the corresponding boards in Scotland and Ireland, powers, in default of action by the Local Authority, to institute proceedings at the instance of their officers against persons infringing the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, and prescribes procedure to be followed in such prosecutions. Held that the exercise of these powers was optional and not obligatory; that the officers of these boards were entitled to institute proceedings as private individuals in the method prescribed by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875; and that they were not limited in prosecutions at their instance to the procedure prescribed by the Act of 1899. Falconer v. Whyte, March 20, 1908, (J.) p. 40. See Police, 5-8.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Public-House Offences—Breach of Certificate—Third offence—Proof—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, secs. 53, 91, 102, and 103.

1. A publican who had been convicted of breach of certificate, upon a complaint bearing that it was a "third offence," brought a suspension upon the ground that (after evidence for the prosecution and the defence had been led, the cases for the respective parties closed, and parties heard with regard to the particular breach alleged, and after the justices had found the accused guilty thereof), a witness was put in to prove two previous convictions against the accused; that this evidence was incompetently admitted; that no other evidence of the offence charged being a third offence had been led; and that such evidence should have been led, as this was a substantive part of the charge. Held that the procedure complained of amounted to nothing more at most than a "deviation in point of form from the statutory enactment," that consequently the only form of review competent was an appeal under sec. 102 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, and that the suspension was incompetent. Opinions that the procedure followed by the Justices was competent and proper. Mitchell v. Morrison, May 13, 1908, (J.) p. 65.

Public-House Offences—Sale of exciseable liquors to children—Responsibility of Publican for assistant—Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, sec. 59.

2. Under sec. 59 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, every holder of a certificate who knowingly sells or delivers, or allows any person to sell or deliver, exciseable liquors to any person under fourteen years of age, except in corked or sealed vessels in quantities not less than one pint, is guilty of an offence. Exciseable liquors in quantities less than one pint were sold in open vessels to a girl of eleven years of age by a publican's assistant, who had means of knowing the age of the child. The sale took place outwith the publican's presence and actual personal knowledge, but no sufficient instructions had been given by him to his assistant not to supply children under fourteen years of age with exciseable liquors except as provided by sec. 59 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903. Held that the publican had been rightly convicted of a contravention of that section. Greig v. Macleod, Dec. 4, 1907, (J.) p. 14.

enacts that where a line of railway crosses "any turnpike road or public highway," and the road is carried over the railway by means of a bridge, such bridge and the approaches thereto "shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the [railway] company." Held that the words "public highway" applied only to roads which were public de jure. Corporation of Glasgow v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 29, 1907, p. 244.

Construction and Maintenance—Questions with Local Authorities—Road—Bridge over Railway—Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1872, secs. 4, 26.

The Caledonian Railway Act, 1872, sec. 4, enacts that the Company "may make and maintain" certain railways, and "may execute the other works and operations hereinafter mentioned." With reference to one of the railways authorised, which crossed a certain road, sec. 26 enacts:—"In constructing railway No. 2 the following provisions shall be binding on the Company, who shall construct the works hereinafter specified in manner hereinafter directed . . . (3) the road . . . shall be carried over the railway by a bridge not less than 40 feet wide." The railway company by virtue of the powers conferred on them by secs. 4 and 26 of the foregoing special Act, constructed railway No. 2, and, where it crossed the road, carried the road over the railway by means of a bridge. Held that since the section of the special Act providing for the construction of the bridge did not specify that the road upon it was to be maintained by the railway company, no such duty lay upon it under the provisions of that Act. Corporation of Glasgow v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 29, 1907, p. 244.

Construction and Maintenance—Questions with Third Parties—Road forming "part of any railway"—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 4 (31).

An unformed road in a burgh, 40 feet in width, was bounded on one side by a line of railway from which it was separated by a wall. The solum of the road ex adverso of the railway to the extent of 30 feet of its width was the property of the railway company, who had acquired it by voluntary disposition under a power to purchase land for extraordinary purposes. Over the road there existed a public right of way for traffic of every description. Held that the road was not "part of a railway" in the sense of sec. 4 (31) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, but was a private street within the meaning of that Act. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Hutchison, Feb. 19, 1908, p. 587.

Construction and Maintenance—Questions between Companies—Siding—Renewal of Siding—Identity of Subject—Running Powers—Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865, sec. 15.

The Caledonian and General Terminus Railways Amalgamation Act, 1865, conferred on certain railway companies running powers over the sidings of the railways vested by the Act in the Caledonian Railway, "constructed at the time of the commencement of this Act, or any renewals thereof." Circumstances connected with the construction of a siding in which held that the siding in question was a renewal of a siding in existence at the commencement of the Act. North British Railway Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., Oct. 18, 1907, p. 16.

Traffic and Carriage—Passengers—Injuries to Passengers—Failure of railway servants to close carriage doors before setting train in motion. Traffic and Carriage—Passengers—Injuries to Passengers—Crowd on Station Platform.

6. Circumstances in which held that the injuries of a woman who had been pushed off a railway platform by a crowd were not due to negligence on the part of the Railway Company. M'Callum v. North British Railway Co., Jan. 14, 1908, p. 415.

Traffic and Carriage—Passengers—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 96—Travelling without paying fare—Intent to avoid payment.

7. A workman, who had travelled by a workman's train, attempted to leave the station where he alighted without giving up a ticket (his intention being to defraud the railway company), but was prevented from doing so, and thereupon produced from his pocket and tendered a workman's ticket valid and available for the journey. Workmen's tickets are not dated, and can be used at any time. Held that the workman had not been guilty of travelling "without having previously paid his fare and with intent to avoid payment thereof" in the sense of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 96. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Roper, May 13, 1908, (J.) p. 69.

Traffic and Carriage—Goods—Agreements with Traders—Owner of cattle undertaking risk of carriage if sent by route specified—Damage sustained on different route—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, sec. 7—Limitation of Company's Liability.

8. A railway company agreed with the owner of three head of cattle consigned by rail from Maxton Station to Alnwick, via Kelso, for exhibition at a cattle show at Alnwick, that if they were not sold they should be taken back to Maxton at half fare, provided the owner consigned them by the same route as that by which they had been sent, and undertook the risk of their conveyance. Between Kelso and Alnwick there were two railway routes equally convenient, one by Wooler, the other by Tweedmouth. The Railway Company sent the cattle to Alnwick by the Wooler route. The cattle were not sold at the show, and the owner's agent in sending them back from Alnwick Station signed a consignment note bearing that they were sent for carriage back to Maxton "by the same route as on the journey here, at the reduced rate," "and in consideration of your charging such reduced rate," "the undersigned agrees to free and relieve you of all liability" for loss or damage, unless caused by wilful misconduct on the part of their servants. The Railway Company chose to send the cattle back by the Tweedmouth route and they were destroyed by fire at Tweedmouth Junction. In an action brought by the owner of the cattle against the Railway Company for £800 as the value of the cattle the defenders maintained (1) that they were not liable, as they had sent them back by the route contracted for, viz., by Kelso; (2) that the stipulation that they should be returned by the same route was a stipulation solely for their own benefit, and conferred no right on the sender of the cattle; (3) that in any view their liability was restricted to £15 for each animal, in respect that no declaration of an excess value was made on behalf of the owner in terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, sec. 7. Held (1) that the Railway Company had broken the contract, and could not found on the indemnity clause therein, but (2) that their liability for the loss of the cattle was limited to £15 per animal. Lord Polwarth v. North British Railway Co., Nov. 15, 1907, p. 1275.

Ability of master for wrongful act of servant—Wrongous Detention.

A lady who had been a guest at a hydropathic establishment, brought an action of damages against the proprietors of the Hydropathic, in which she averred that when she was at the Hydropathic she went, at the request of the defenders' manager, to his private room; that she there found a Mr and Mrs R., who were fellow guests; that Mrs R. had conceived an ill-will against the pursuer, and that the defenders' manager knew this; that Mr and Mrs R. placed themselves against the door to prevent the pursuer from leaving the room; that the manager said that he would not allow the pursuer to leave the room until she apologised to Mrs R. for slamming a door in her face—"a thing the pursuer had never done"—and that the manager aided and abetted Mr and Mrs R. in preventing the pursuer from leaving the room for about fifteen minutes. The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant in respect that the pursuer's averments shewed that the manager was not, on the occasion in question, acting within the scope of his employment. Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant. Mackenzie v. Cluny Hill Hydropathic Co., Limited, Nov. 23, 1907, p. 200.

Held that an employer is liable for a verbal slander uttered by his servant in the course of the servant's employment and for the benefit of the master. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, June 9, 1908, p. 928.

In an action of damages for slander brought by a married woman against a limited liability company as the owners of a theatre, the pursuer averred that while she was witnessing a performance in the defenders' theatre the defenders' servants falsely stated, within the hearing of her husband and others, that she was a notorious prostitute who had been thrown out of the theatre two weeks previously for being drunk and disorderly, and said that she must leave the theatre; and that the statements complained of were made by the defenders' servants in the course of their service and for the defenders' benefit. The pursuer referred for its terms to a bye-law, made under statutory authority, founded on by the defenders, which was applicable to the theatre, and which provided that the licensed manager should not permit men or women of bad fame to enter the theatre. Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, June 9, 1908, p. 928.

In an action of damages for slander brought by a married man against a limited liability company, as the owners of a theatre, the pursuer averred that while he and his wife were witnessing a performance in the defenders' theatre the under-manager falsely stated that the pursuer's wife was a bad character and must leave the theatre, that on the pursuer explaining that the lady was his wife, the under-manager replied that "he had heard that story before," and that the under-manager subsequently falsely stated to the manager of the theatre that the pursuer's wife was a notorious prostitute who had two weeks previously been thrown out of the theatre for being drunk and disorderly. The pursuer further averred that the statements complained of were made of and concerning him, and represented that he was a person of loose and immoral habits and character, that he was associating with a notorious prostitute of drunken and disorderly habits, and was attempting by deliberate falsehood to pass her off as his wife; that the management and conduct of the theatre were left in the hands of the manager and under-manager, and that the statements complained of were made by the under-manager in the course of his employment and for the benefit of the defenders. The pursuer referred to a bye-law, made under statutory authority, which was applicable to the theatre, and which provided that the licensed manager should not permit men or women of bad fame to enter the theatre. Held that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, June 9, 1908, p. 928.

6. Murray, the Superintendent of the Gorbals Public Baths, Glasgow, employed by the Corporation of Glasgow, sent a report to Thomson, the General Manager of the Public Baths, Glasgow, also employed by the Corporation, commenting adversely on the conduct of Beaton, a swimming instructor at the Gorbals Baths, employed by the School Board of Glasgow. Thomson, the General Manager, sent the report to the School Board of Glasgow. In an action of damages raised by Beaton against the Corporation the pursuer averred that Thomson, "in the execution of his duty as General Manager of the Public Baths," had forwarded the report to the Glasgow School Board, who employed Beaton to teach swimming, and that the report was slanderous, and caused the School Board to dismiss him. "In writing and dispatching the said report the said Robert A. Murray and William Thomson acted within the scope of their authority from the defenders, and in the discharge of their duties as servants of the defenders, and in the supposed furtherance of the interests of the defenders." The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant, and that the defenders were not responsible for the acts of their servants "outwith the scope of their duties and authority." Held that prima facie it was no part of the duty of the general manager of baths to make communications on behalf of the Corporation to the School Board, that it was not enough to aver generally that the report was forwarded by the general manager "in the execution of his duty," and that in the absence of any averment that he had special authority to act as he did, the action was irrelevant. Beaton v. Corporation of Glasgow, June 17, 1908, p. 1010.

Liability of master for negligence of servant—Whether servant of A pro hac vice servant of B.

7. In pursuance of their scientific investigations, the Fishery Board for Scotland from time to time arranged with the owners of trawl boats to carry on board their boats an employee of the Fishery Board, who was allowed to collect from the catches, and retain for the use of the Board, specimens of different kinds of fish. In return for this service, trawl boats carrying a Fishery Board employee were allowed to fish within restricted waters, and to retain the catches, without rendering themselves liable to a charge of illegal trawling. The Fishery Board employee was entitled to point out the places where he wished the trawling to be conducted, but neither he nor the Board had any control over the navigation or management of any trawl boats so engaged. A trawl boat with a Fishery Board representative on board, under an arrangement of the above description, was stranded through the fault of her master, and the Fishery Board representative in consequence died from exposure. His widow brought an action of damages against the owner of the trawler, who pleaded that he was not responsible for the fault of the master in respect that the master was on the occasion in question pro hac vice in the service of the Fishery Board. Held that the master was not pro hac vice the servant of the Fishery Board, and that the defender was liable in damages to the pursuer. Burgoyne v. Walker, Dec. 11, 1907, p. 321.

Liability of Landlord for Pollution by Tenant.

Landlord held liable for pollution of river caused by improper use by tenants of drains provided by him. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

Liability of Defenders—Joint and Several Liability.

In an action of damages against several defenders for loss caused by the pollution of a stream, held that, as each of the defenders had contributed materially to the pollution, they were liable jointly and severally for the whole amount of the damage which ensued. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

In an action of payment against six defenders "jointly and severally," decree of the defenders were assoltied. Held that a decree against the remaining defenders conjunctly and severally was competent. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

Wrongous use of diligence—Imprisonment—Decree ad factum præstandum—Decree for delivery—Small-Debt Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1889, secs. 1 and 2, and Sched. B.—Imprisonment on decree under sec. 1 of the Small-Debt Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1889. Stewart v. Dougall, Dec. 13, 1907, p. 315.

Wrongous use of Diligence—Imprisonment—Decree ad factum præstandum—Decree for delivery of furniture sequestrated for rent—Malicious use of Diligence—Averments of Malice.

J. & Co. took decree in absence against R. for delivery of furniture retained by him from them under a hire purchase agreement, the instalments due under the agreement not having been paid, and thereupon on 13th May 1907—in the knowledge that the furniture had been sequestrated for rent by R.'s landlord, and that decree of cessio had been pronounced against R.—applied for and obtained a warrant upon which R. was imprisoned on 14th May 1907. In an action by J. & Co. against J. & Co. for damages for wrongous imprisonment on the ground that J. & Co. at the date when they put the warrant in force knew that it was impossible for R. to give delivery of the furniture, held that, notwithstanding the sequestration and the cessio, the defenders were entitled to enforce the decree by imprisonment; and that the pursuer having been imprisoned under a warrant legally obtained and executed, the defenders, in the absence of relevant averments of malice, were entitled to absolvitor. Rudman v. Jay & Co., Feb. 7, 1908, p. 552.

Defender—Innuendo.

Averments in an action of slander by the husband of a woman, who had been called a prostitute and ordered to leave a theatre by the theatre manager, which were held irrelevant. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, June 9, 1908, p. 928.

Defender—Privilege—Malice—Issue.

In an action by a married woman for having been called a prostitute and ordered to leave a theatre by the theatre manager, the pursuer referred for its terms to a bye-law, made under statutory authority, and founded on by the defenders, which was applicable to the theatre, and which provided that the licensed manager should not permit men or women of bad fame to enter the theatre. Held that the occasion was privileged and that malice must be inserted in the issue. Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited, June 9, 1908, p. 928.

Slander—Privilege—Judicial Slander—Averments regarding co-defender in divorce action—Malice—Sufficiency of averments of malice.

15. In an action of divorce for adultery brought by a husband against his wife, the wife's alleged paramour was called as co-defender. The husband founded on a written confession by the wife admitting that she had misconducted herself with the co-defender, and averred:—"In consequence of the information elicited by the pursuer from the defender, the pursuer has made inquiries and has ascertained, and now avers, that" upon certain dates "the defender misconducted herself with the co-defender, and that the co-defender is the father of the child which was born to the defender." The Lord Ordinary granted decree of divorce against the wife, but assoilzied the co-defender with expenses. Thereafter the co-defender brought an action against the husband for reparation for the slander contained in the statements in the divorce action. He averred that these statements were made falsely, calumniously, and maliciously, and without probable or any cause. That no inquiries had been made by the husband or on his behalf relative to the co-defender's conduct, and that no evidence was attempted to be led at the trial against him. That the wife had been induced by the husband to write the alleged confession, and that the husband knew that the confession was untrue. Held that this being a case of judicial slander it was necessary for the pursuer to set forth facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred, that the pursuer had failed to set forth facts from which it could be inferred that the defender's statements in his action of divorce, which were relevant, were made from a malicious motive, and therefore that the present action was irrelevant, and the defender was entitled to absolvitor. M. v. H., July 11, 1908, p. 1130.

Negligence—Duty to Public—Responsibility of Town-Council—River adjoining Public Park—Duty to fence—Child.

16. A father brought an action against the Corporation of Glasgow for damages for the death of his infant son, who had been drowned in the River Kelvin while playing in one of the public parks adjoining the river. The pursuer averred that at the place the bank of the river, which was unfenced, was worn away; that the river was liable to sudden floods, during which its flow became swift and violent, and its depth increased from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 feet; that the accident occurred during one of these floods; that the river was thus a danger to the public, and especially to children; that it was the duty of the defenders to have had it fenced; and that the accident was due to their negligence in failing to perform this duty. Held that there was no relevant averment of fault on the part of the defenders, and action dismissed. Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow, July 2, 1908, p. 1034.

Negligence—Duty to Public—Horses shying at motor-car left unattended—Breach of statutory provisions—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 123, incorporating the General Turnpike Act, 1831, sec. 96.

17. The driver of a motor-car drew up his car at the side of the road, leaving ample room for traffic to pass, stopped the engine, and left the car there unattended, while he paid a visit of fifteen minutes to a house near by. While he was away the horses of a passing wagonette shied at the motor-car, and got out of control, and damage was done to the wagonette and to the horses. The owner of the wagonette having raised an action of damages against the owner of the motor-car, the Sheriff-substitute held that the driver of the car was in breach of section 96 of the General Turnpike Act, 1831, in leaving the car unattended, and that the accident had resulted therefrom, and awarded damages. In an appeal, the Court assoilzied the defender,

an action of damages for personal injuries brought against a railway company by a passenger who, after alighting from a train, had been knocked down by an open carriage door as the train was leaving the station, the pursuer averred that "the said accident to the pursuer was due to the fault and negligence of defenders' servants, for whom defenders are responsible. When said train was stopped at said platform there were no porters or officials on the platform to see that the doors of the carriages were closed before the train was restarted. It is the duty of the defenders, and is the invariable practice of railway companies, to close the doors of compartments before a train is allowed to leave the station, but this the defenders and their servants culpably and negligently failed to do on the occasion of this accident to pursuer. The defenders and their said servants were also negligent in respect that they set said train in motion without closing said door." He also averred that the defenders' servants were negligent in failing to have the lamps at the station lighted, and that the station was so dark that the pursuer could not see whether the doors were closed or not. Held that the pursuer had averred facts from which a jury might infer negligence. Toal v. North British Railway Co., May 26, 1908, (H. L.) p. 29.

negligence—Railway—Injury to passenger—Crowd on Station Platform. A married woman with an infant in her arms was standing with her husband at Waverley Station, Edinburgh, on a Saturday evening in September, waiting for additional carriages to be added to a train which was to leave a quarter of an hour later. Before the carriages were in position, an orderly crowd of passengers collecting behind the woman and pressing forward on the arrival of the carriages, the woman was pushed off the platform upon the carriages and was injured. In an action for damages raised by the woman against the railway Company, in which the above facts were proved, held that the pursuer's injuries were not due to negligence on the part of the railway Company, and defenders assolized. McCallum v. North British Railway Co., Jan. 14, 1908, p. 415.

measure of Damages—Solatium—Death of husband and father—Admission of liability—Relevancy of considering (1) sufferings of deceased, (2) grossness of negligence of defenders. In an action of damages against a railway company, at the instance of the widow and children of a passenger who had died from injuries received in a railway accident, the defenders admitted liability for the injuries of the deceased. The pursuers proposed an issue in ordinary form, whether the deceased had been injured "through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers." The defenders objected to this form of issue, and proposed that the issue should contain a recital of the admission of liability, with the sole question,—"What is the amount of the loss, injury, and damage sustained by the pursuers?" The Court, following the established practice in such cases, approved of the issue in ordinary form; but were of opinion that, in estimating the amount of damages, including solatium, due to the pursuers, the sufferings of the deceased could be a relevant consideration, but not the grossness of the fault of the defenders. Black v. North British Railway Co., Jan. 18, 1908, p. 444.

1. In 1901 the King, by commission under the Great Seal, appointed a body of commissioners "to receive, hear, and determine" the claims of persons claiming the right to perform services at the time of the Coronation. Claims to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland were put forward by the Earl of Lauderdale, and by Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, and by another person. The Court of Claims pronounced this deliverance:—"The Court considers that the right to the office . . . is vested in the family of Scrymgeour, and that the petitioner, Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, has established a prima facie title to represent that family: And the Court adjudges that the claim of the said petitioner . . . be allowed him to be exercised on the day of their Majesties' Coronation." The other claims were disallowed. Subsequently an action was raised in the Court of Session at the instance of the Earl of Lauderdale for declarator that he was entitled to the office. The action was defended by Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, who pleaded, inter alia, "res judicata" in respect of the decision of the Court of Claims. Held that the Court of Claims did not decide the legal right to the office in perpetuity, but only determined the person who was prima facie entitled to officiate at the Coronation, and plea of res judicata repelled. Earl of Lauderdale v. Wedderburn, July 18, 1908, p. 1237.

Competent and Omitted—Decree for Expenses in name of Agent-disburser—Objections not stated timeously.

2. A party to an action in the Sheriff Court who had allowed the agent of his opponent to obtain decree for expenses in his own name, held to be barred by the exception of competent and omitted from suspending a charge on the allegation (1) that the agent had not, at the time when the motion for expenses was made, paid his dues as law-agent, and (2) that de facto he was not the agent-disburser. *Rennie v. 1. O., a British subject resident in Aberdeen, was the sole partner of the firm of O. & Sons, carrying on business in Toronto, Canada. O. carried on the business by managers in Toronto, who were required to render to him a weekly statement of all the transactions. O. had the sole right to manage and to control every department, and was alone entitled to the profits, and alone liable for the debts. O. having been assessed for income-tax under Schedule D, Case I., upon the whole profits of his business in Canada, appealed, contending that the Canadian business being entirely conducted by the managers there without his interference it was to be regarded as a foreign possession liable to income-tax only on the profits received in this country under Case V. Held that the business was carried on by O. in the United Kingdom, and that he was liable to be assessed on the whole profits of the business under Case I. of Schedule D. Ogilvie v. Inland Revenue, June 17, 1908, p. 1003.

Income-Tax—Income—Deductions—Fire and Accident Insurance—Balance of Profit—Unexpired Risks.

In an appeal by an accident assurance corporation against an assessment for income-tax on profits, the First Division held, following Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v. Inland Revenue, Feb. 8, 1889, 6 R. 461 and 474, and Imperial Fire Insurance Co. v. Wilson, 1876, 5 L. T. R. 271, that in ascertaining for income-tax purposes the annual profits of a company carrying on the business of fire, sickness, accident, and guarantee insurance, no deduction fell to be made in respect of estimated losses on risks unexpired at the end of the year. The Assurance Corporation having appealed to the House of Lords, held that the appellants had failed to shew that the rule adopted in these cases had operated inequitably in their case, and appeal dismissed. T IN SECURITY. Heritable Security—Bond and Disposition in Security—Personal Obligation—Transmission to heir—"Personal right"—"Taking estate by succession"—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, secs. 9 and 47.

Held that a person in whom a personal right to an estate in land has vested by survivorship, but who has not made up a title thereto, or entered into possession, has not "taken" such estate by succession within the meaning of sec. 47 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and is not liable to personal diligence for the debts of his predecessor secured by bond over the lands. Fenton Livingstone v. Crichton's Trustees, July 18, 1908, p. 1208.

Heritable Security—Bond and Disposition in Security—Confusio—Bond over Entailed Lands—Defective Entail—Acquisition of Bond by Heir of Entail in Possession.

*The heir in possession of certain lands under a deed of entail, which was defective in the irritant clauses, died in ignorance of this fact and without evacuating the destination. While in possession of the lands he acquired right to a bond over the lands by succession ab intestato to the creditor in the bond. Held that the bond was not extinguished confusione in the person of the heir, in respect that he possessed the lands and the bond under different destinations, and that this was not affected by the invalidity of the entail, as the tailzied destination had not been evacuated by him. Colville's Trustees v. Marindin, June 6, 1908, p. 911.*

*Heritable Security—Bond and Disposition in Security—Discharge—Confusio—Disposition ex facie absolute to Bondholder—Unrecorded back-letter.*

*The holder of a bond and disposition in security obtained from the debtor, in security of an additional loan, a disposition ex facie absolute which was recorded, and granted a back-letter which was not recorded. In a question between this bondholder and the holder of a postponed bond granted prior to the ex facie absolute disposition, held that the radical right remaining with the granter prevented the first bond from being extinguished confusione when the absolute disposition was granted. Heritable Security—Assignment in security of long lease—Action of Maills and Duties—Competency—Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, secs. 6 and 20—Heritable Securities (Scotland) Act, 1847, sec. 2.

Held that as the Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, in giving to the person in right of an assignment in security of a recorded lease a right to enter on possession and uplift the rents, had provided a special procedure for his doing so, it by implication excluded any other mode of procedure, and that an action of mails and duties at his instance was incompetent. Dunbar v. Gill, July 4, 1908, p. 1054.

RIVER, LOCH, AND SEA. Pollution—Interdict—Title to Sue.

1. In an action for interdict at the instance of the tenant of a farm to prevent pollution of a stream which flowed through his lands, and at which his cattle were watered, against the proprietors of houses (let to tenants) on the upper part of the stream, held that, as the pursuer was the assignee of the landlord's title, in so far as it was necessary for his own protection in the subjects let, he had the same right as the landlord to maintain the purity of the stream, and accordingly that he had a good title to pursue the action. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

Pollution—Responsibility of Landlord for Pollution by Tenant.

2. The proprietors of a block of workmen's cottages erected for the use of their tenants earth closets, and made drains, which were only intended to receive water from wash-houses and sinks, but which were used by the occupants of the houses as a receptacle for sewage, with the result that a stream which flowed through an adjoining farm, and into which the drains discharged, was polluted, and injury was caused to the cattle which watered at the stream. In defence to an action of interdict and damages directed against the proprietors of the houses, the defenders pleaded that they had provided an effective drainage system, and were not responsible for pollution due to an improper use thereof by their tenants. The Court held that the improper use of the drains might have been anticipated, and that, as the proprietors had made the drains in such a way that pollution was a probable result, they were responsible therefor; but continued the cause that the defenders might submit a scheme to avoid pollution. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

Pollution—Plurality of Defenders—Joint and Several Liability.

3. In an action of damages against several defenders for loss caused by the pollution of a stream, held that, as each of the defenders had contributed materially to the pollution, they were liable jointly and severally for the whole amount of the damage which ensued. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

ROAD. Road Authority—Motor-car—Road in Burgh maintained by County—Title to apply for Speed Limit—Motor-Car Act, 1903, secs. 9 and 18—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, sec. 47.

The burgh of Dunbar, under sec. 47 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, devolved the "management and maintenance" of a road within the burgh upon the County Council of Haddington. The County Council, as being the Road Authority, thereafter applied for and obtained a Regulation made by the Secretary for Scotland, under secs. 9 and 18 of the Motor-Car Act, 1903, restricting the speed of motor-cars on this road to ten miles an hour. The driver of a motor-car having been convicted of a contravention of the Regulation, brought a suspension pleading that the Regulation was ultra vires, in respect that the County Council were not the Local Authority entitled to apply for the Regulation. The Court refused the suspension, per Lord McLaren and Lord Pearson, on the ground that the Regulation was not ultra vires, and, per Lord Kinnear, on the ground that even if the Regulation was ultra vires the burgh of Sale of Moveables—Constitution and Validity—No consensus in them—Identity of Purchaser—Question with innocent third party.

Telford falsely represented to Morrison that he was the son of Wilson, a dairyman, and had authority from him to purchase two cows. Morrison, who knew Wilson to be a dairyman and in good credit, was deceived by the representation, agreed to sell the cows on the usual credit, and delivered them to Telford, who never paid the price. Hereafter Robertson purchased the cows from Telford in good faith and without knowing that they had been improperly obtained, and paid the price demanded by Telford. In an action by Morrison against Robertson for delivery of the cows, held (1) that the cows were never sold to Telford, and (2) that the purchaser from him had no title to retain them. Morrison v. Robertson, Dec. 19, 1907, p. 332.

Sale of Moveables—Subject—Implied condition as to fitness—Reliance on seller's Skill and Judgment—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 14 (1)—Application of sec. 14 (1) to non-manufactured goods.

Jeffrey, a salesman for Crichton & Stevenson, coalmasters, having asked Honeyman, a shipbroker, for an order, Honeyman told him that he had a ship coming in for which he would require bunker coal, and that he had been using Auchlochan unscreened coal. Jeffrey told him that his firm could supply Slamannan coal from Strathaven Colliery, unscreened, which he thought would suit if Auchlochan suited. Honeyman expressed his willingness to give an order, but said that the order must be given through Love, a coal merchant with whom he dealt. Honeyman communicated this conversation to Love, and at a subsequent meeting between Love and Jeffrey the latter received an order for Strathaven coal, and was told the name of the ship for which it was intended, both parties knowing that the order had reference to the coal which Honeyman had agreed to take. The coal when delivered proved quite unfit for the purpose of bunkering the ship, and was rejected. In an action by Crichton & Stevenson against Love, for the price of the coal, held (1) that the conversation between Jeffrey and Honeyman was in the mind of both parties when the order was given, and formed part of the transaction, (2) that considering the transaction thus, the buyer had made known to the seller the particular purpose for which the coal was required, and had relied on the seller's skill and judgment in the matter, (3) that the warranty as to fitness thereby implied had not been fulfilled, and that the buyer was not liable for the price of the coal. Crichton & Stevenson v. Love, March 19, 1908, p. 818.

Sale of Moveables—Subject—Disconformity to Contract—Sale by Sample—Rejection—Partial Rejection—"Goods of a different description"—Invalid partial rejection no bar to claim of damages—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, secs. 11 (2) and 30 (3).

A buyer of "maroon twills," under a sale by sample, having discovered that part of the goods was not conform to sample in quality intimated rejection of this part of the goods, and returned them to the seller, who refused to take them back and sent them again to the buyer. Held (1) that the defective goods being goods of the kind bought, although inferior to sample in quality, were not "goods of a different description" in the sense of sec. 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and that the buyer was not entitled to reject the defective part of the goods and retain the rest; but (2) that as the seller was not prejudiced by the attempted partial rejection, the buyer was not barred thereby from claiming damages for breach of the contract. Aitken, Campbell, & Co., Limited, v. Boullen & Gatenby, Jan. 24, 1908, p. 490.

Sale of Moveables—Transference of property—Ship—Property in ship in course of construction—Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

4. A shipbuilder contracted to build a ship for an Italian firm of ship-owners. The purchase price was to be paid by instalments at certain stages of the construction. The contract bore that the vessel should not be considered as delivered and finally accepted by the firm until it had passed a certain trial trip. When the ship was completed, and the greater part of the purchase price had been paid, but before the trial trip, the ship was arrested in the hands of the shipbuilder for a debt alleged to be due by the Italian firm to the arresters. In a petition by the shipbuilder the First Division recalled the arrestments, on the ground that the property in the ship had not passed to the Italian firm. In an appeal, held that, under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the passing of the property depended on the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract, and, on a construction of the contract, that it was not the intention of the parties here that the property in the ship should pass until it was finally handed over to the shipowners, and appeal dismissed. Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, v. Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited, Nov. 25, 1907, (H. L.) p. 1.

Sale of Heritage—Assignment of Rents—Legal and Conventional Terms—Pastoral Farms—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 8.

5. A disposition of an estate, with entry at 2d February 1905, contained a clause of assignation of rents in the statutory form. The farms on the estate were pastoral, and were let on leases of which the term of entry was Whitsunday, and under which the legal terms of payment of rent were conventionally postponed till the following term. In an action by the seller against the purchaser, who had uplifted the rents legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 and conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905, the pursuer maintained that in the case of leases of pastoral farms with entry at Whitsunday (when the first half year's rent became legally due) the rents legally due at each term were really due for the possession during the half year preceding the legal term of payment, and consequently that the rents legally due at Whitsunday 1905, being due for the possession during the half year ending Whitsunday 1905, were not "rents to become due for the possession following the term of entry" of the defender within the meaning of sec. 8 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868. Held that the rents legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 were for the possession subsequent to Whitsunday 1905, and so were carried to the defender by the clause of assignation of rents. Wigan v. Cripps, Jan. 10, 1908, p. 394.

Sale of Heritage—Assignment of Rents—Minute of Sale providing for apportionment of rents—Disposition containing statutory clause of assignation of rents—Whether disposition superseded minute.

6. The proprietor of an estate consisting of pastoral farms let under leases of which the term of entry was Whitsunday, and under which the legal terms of payment of rent were conventionally postponed until the following term, agreed by minute of sale to sell the estate with entry at 2d February 1905. The minute of sale contained, inter alia, this clause:—"The rents, rates, and taxes for the possession of said lands for the half year from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905 shall be apportioned between" the seller and the purchaser. The disposition in favour of the purchaser following on the minute contained a clause of assignation of rents in the statutory form. In an action by the seller against the purchaser, who had uplifted the rents legally payable at Martinmas 1904 and conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905, the pursuer maintained that the minute of sale was superseded by the disposition, and consequently that the clause in the minute apportioning the rents was no longer effectual. Held that the rents legally due at Martinmas 1904 and conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905 vested at Martinmas 1904 in the pursuer; and therefore that the clause in the minute providing for the apportionment of rents constituted a contract for payment of money by the pursuer to the defender which was not affected by the disposition of the lands. Wigan v. Cripps, Jan. 10, 1908, p. 394.

The Education (Scotland) Acts confer no right upon a child to compel a school board to provide him with education. Sinclair v. Moulin School Board, March 17, 1908, p. 772.

Observed that the only person entitled to bring an action against a school board to compel them to provide a child with education is the parent (as defined by the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 1). Sinclair v. Moulin School Board, March 17, 1908, p. 772.

Powers, Rights, and Duties of School Board—Duty to provide education—Defective Children—Education of Defective Children (Scotland) Act, 1906, secs. 1 and 2.

Opinions (1) that the school board, subject to the Education Department, are the proper judges of the question whether a child is defective, and that the Court will not inquire into the correctness of their decision, except upon relevant averments of mala fides, oppression, or the like; (2) that a school board were entitled both to refuse to receive a child into the ordinary school as being "defective," and also at the same time to refuse to make any special provision for its education elsewhere. Sinclair v. Moulin School Board, March 17, 1908, p. 772.

RIFF. Jurisdiction—Administrative or Judicial—Petition to designate land for burial ground—Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855.

Held that proceedings under a petition to designate certain lands as a burial ground, in terms of the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, were administrative and not judicial. Liddall v. Ballingry Parish Council, July 4, 1908, p. 1082.

Jurisdiction—Jurisdiction of Sheriff to review Sheriff-substitute—Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, secs. 9, 10, 32.

In a petition, under the Burial Grounds Act, 1855, for the designation of a burial ground, a decision of the Sheriff-substitute cannot competently be appealed to the Sheriff. Strichen Parish Council v. Goodwillie, May 20, 1908, p. 835.

Jurisdiction—Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator under Workmen's Compensation Act—Incidental Question—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, secs. 1 (3), 13, First Sched. (8).

Held that the Sheriff-substitute, acting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in determining the question whether the claimant was a dependant, had jurisdiction, and was bound, to decide any incidental question as to his or her relationship to the deceased. Johnstone v. Spencer & Co., June 18, 1908, p. 1015.

Small-Debt Court—Review—Decree in absence or in foro by default—Litiscontestation—Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, sec. 16.

4. In a Sheriff Court small-debt case both parties appeared at the first diet, when, after a statement of the defence and some discussion thereon, the case was continued for proof. At the adjourned diet the defender failed to appear, and decree was pronounced against him. He thereafter applied for and obtained a sist under section 16 of the Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, and was ultimately assoilzied. The pursuer appealed upon the ground that the sist was incompetent, the decree having been a decree in foro after litiscontestation, and not a decree in absence. Held that the decree was a decree in absence, that the sist was consequently competent, and appeal dismissed. Observations on the use of the expression litiscontestation with regard to procedure in the Sheriff Small-Debt Court. Ratcliffe v. Farquharson, May 14, 1908, (J.) p. 71.

Small-Debt Court—Review—Competency—Deviation from statutory form—Counter Claim—Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1837, secs. 11, 31.

5. In a small-debt action for payment of £14 as house rent due under a written lease, the Sheriff, after a proof, gave decree for £5. The pursuer appealed. Appeal sustained on the ground of incompetency and deviation from statutory form, in respect that as the decree was for a sum which had no relation to what was sued for, it was incompetent; or, otherwise, that if, as explained by the defender, the Sheriff had deducted from the sum sued for a sum in name of damages for breach of contract on the part of the landlord in failing to do his best to re-let the house, such a claim was a counter claim, of which the defender was bound to give notice, as required by section 11 of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, and that, as he had failed to do so, the Sheriff was not entitled to consider it. Mair's Trustees v. Miller, May 8, 1908, (J.) p. 74.

SHIP.

1. Transference of property—Property in ship in course of construction—Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Sir James Laing & Sons, Limited, v. Barclay, Curle, & Co., Limited, Nov. 25, 1907, (H. L.) p. 1.

Maritime Lien—Lex loci or lex fori—Expenditure on British ship in foreign port.

2. In a process in Scotland for the judicial sale of a British ship, then lying in a Scottish port, warrant for sale was granted, and the ship was sold. A claim for a preferential ranking on the purchase price was lodged in the process by a New York firm, who alleged that by American law they had a good lien over the ship for certain expenditure incurred by them on her account while she was lying at New York. Held that the question whether any claimants in this process had a lien over the ship fell to be determined by Scots law, and not by American law. Clark v. Bowring & Co., July 16, 1908, p. 1168.

Maritime Lien—Seamen's wages—Payment by third party—Acquisition of lien by third party—Acquisition without written assignation—Payments not made on credit of the ship.

3. The owners of a British ship, which was in need of repairs, requested a firm of shipbrokers in New York to give assistance to the ship on her arrival at New York. On the arrival of the ship the firm of shipbrokers expended a considerable sum on repairs and necessaries and also paid the seamen's wages. These payments were put together in a lump sum, and the owners accepted a bill for the amount, but the bill was not met at maturity. The owners having become bankrupt, the ship, which was then in Scotland, was sold by warrant of the Court. The New York firm claimed a preferential ranking on he purchase price in respect of their disbursements for seamen's wages, on the ground that the lien for seamen's wages had transmitted to them. Held (1) that a lien for seamen's wages transmits to the payer without a formal assignation if the payment is made on the credit of the ship; but (2) that, in the circumstances of this case, the payments had been made on the credit of the owners and not of the ship, and that consequently the payer had acquired no lien. Clark v. Bowring & Co., July 16, 1908, p. 1168.

Seaman—Carriage of contraband of war—Refusal of seamen to proceed to belligerent port—Discharge of seaman by master—Wages—Damages—“Final Settlement”—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, secs. 134 and 186.

In 1905, when Russia and Japan were at war, British seamen signed articles to serve on board a British ship for a voyage from Cardiff to Hong-Kong, and, if required, to any port or ports within certain limits of latitude specified. At Cardiff the ship took on board a cargo of coal. Coal had been notified by both belligerents as contraband of war. On arrival at the signal station, about eight hours' steaming from Hong-Kong, the master received orders to proceed to Nagasaki in Japan—a port within the limits specified in the articles. The crew refused to work the vessel to Nagasaki, but were not ordered and did not refuse to work her to Hong-Kong. She was worked to Hong-Kong by the officers alone. At Hong-Kong the members of the crew were each sentenced, at the instance of the master, to three weeks' imprisonment with hard labour, for refusal to obey the lawful orders of the master. In an action by one of the crew against the owners of the vessel for wages at the stipulated rate from the date of the articles down to “the time of final settlement” within the meaning of section 134 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and also for damages, held (1) that the pursuer, having been engaged for an ordinary commercial voyage, was not bound to incur the risks involved in serving on board a vessel carrying contraband of war to a port of one of the belligerents, and was therefore justified in disobeying the order of the master to proceed to Nagasaki; (2) that, the delay in paying the wages being due solely to the wrongful act or default of the master, the pursuer was entitled to wages at the stipulated rate down to “the time of final settlement,” and that “the time of final settlement” was the date of the interlocutor of the Court; and (3) that the pursuer was entitled to a sum in name of damages. Lang v. St Enoch Shipping Co., Limited, Nov. 12, 1907, p. 103.

Seaman—Fishing Vessel—Remuneration by share in profits or gross earnings—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 7 (2).

The sole remuneration of the mate or first fisherman of a steam-trawler while at sea was one and one-eighth share (each share being one-fourteenth) of the net balance of the gross price of the fish caught on a trip after deducting certain specified expenses, which did not include the wages of other members of the crew who were paid by fixed wages. Held that such remuneration was a share in the profits or the gross earnings of the vessel, and that the fisherman so paid fell under the exception contained in sec. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and was consequently precluded from claiming compensation under that Act. Gill v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited, Dec. 14, 1907, p. 328.

Collision—Fog—Duty of stopping—Foreign Vessel—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, Art. 16—Merchant Shipping Act, 1897, sec. 419, subsec. (4).

About noon on 10th February 1907 a collision took place off the coast of Norfolk in a dense fog between the British steamer “James Joicey” proceeding south to London, and the Austrian steamer

"Kostrena," proceeding north to Methil. In cross actions of damages the following facts were held to be proved:—The vessels were proceeding on nearly parallel courses. The "Kostrena" heard a fog-signal from the "James Joicey" but did not stop as required by Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897. Believing that she had the "James Joicey" on her port bow, whereas in point of fact the "James Joicey" was on her starboard bow, the "Kostrena" on approaching the "James Joicey," ported her helm with the result that she went to starboard and collided with the "James Joicey." Austria had adopted the Regulations for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, but had not adopted the collision sections of the Merchant Shipping Act; and the "Kostrena" therefore maintained that the statutory presumption of fault enacted by sec. 419, subsec. (4), of the Act did not apply to her. Held (1) that whether sec. 419, subsec. (4), applied to the "Kostrena" or not, it was essentially bad seamanship for a steam vessel on hearing the fog-signal of another vessel not to stop in order to ascertain the position of the signalling vessel when she next sounded; and (2) that the collision was due to the fault of the "Kostrena," she not having stopped, and having in consequence failed to ascertain the position of the "James Joicey," with the result that the "Kostrena" executed the manœuvre which brought about the collision. The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena," Nov. 27, 1907, p. 295.

Collision—Fog—Vessel "not under command"—"Moderate speed"—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, Arts. 15 and 16.

7. The steamer "James Joicey" through a collision with the steamer "Syria," in a dense fog, had her stem cut away from a little above the water line upwards, with the result that her forward compartment soon filled, but her engines and steering-gear were uninjured, and she was able to proceed and to manœuvre slowly, but she could not go at full speed. She hoisted the signals for a vessel "not under command," but she sounded the ordinary fog-signals and not those required by Art. 15 of the Regulations for a vessel not under command. Some hours afterwards, the fog still continuing, she came into collision with the steamer "Kostrena." In cross actions of damages the "Kostrena" pleaded that the "James Joicey" being a vessel not under command, was in fault in not sounding the signals required by Art. 15. It appeared that the "Kostrena" did not stop, on hearing an ordinary fog-signal from the "James Joicey," in order to ascertain the position of the "James Joicey" when she sounded again, and that this failure to stop was the cause of the collision. Held that as the "James Joicey" was not going at other than a "moderate" speed, in terms of Art. 16, and as when going at a moderate speed she was under command, she could not in the circumstances be described as a vessel not under command, and therefore that she was not in fault in not giving the signals required by Art. 15; and further, that in any view her failure to give these signals did not contribute to the collision, which was due to the "Kostrena" not having stopped on hearing the ordinary fog-signal from the "James Joicey." The "James Joicey" v. The "Kostrena," Nov. 27, 1907, p. 295.

Collision—Fog—"Moderate speed"—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, Art. 16.

8. The "Kostrena" was going at a speed through the water of about 3 knots an hour, but as the tide, which was with her, was running at about $2\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour, her speed over the ground was about $5\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour. Held by Lord Salvesen, Ordinary, that her progress over the ground was to be taken as the measure of her speed, and at $5\frac{1}{2}$ knots was not a "moderate" rate within the meaning of Art. 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897. The James Joicey v. The "Kostrena," Nov. 27, 1907, p. 295.

Collision—Compulsory Pilotage—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 604 (1).

The steamship "Eildon" on a voyage from Leith to Dunkirk called at Middlesborough to complete her cargo. She carried a number of passengers, who were all booked for the voyage from Leith to Dunkirk. On arrival at Middlesborough the "Eildon" loaded cargo at ochrane's Wharf and then proceeded up the Tees to Dent's Wharf, both within the port of Middlesborough, in charge of a licensed pilot, to take in further cargo. While in the river off Dent's Wharf she collided with the lighter "Hebe" and her tug the "Thames." In an action of damages brought by the owners of the "Hebe" and of the "Thames" against the owners of the "Eildon," the defence was that the "Eildon" was carrying passengers between Leith and Middlesborough, and that when the collision occurred she was within a pilotage district and was compelled by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 604 (1), to employ a licensed pilot, and that, having done so, she was not responsible. The pursuers contended that as the only passengers on board the "Eildon" were booked for the voyage from Leith to Dunkirk, the section did not apply. The Court repelled the defenders' plea of compulsory pilotage. Watson v. Gibson & Co., July 7, 1908, p. 1092.

Collision—Limitation of Liability—Competitive claims on limited fund—Expenses of competition—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, secs. 503 and 504.

In a petition at the instance of shipowners for limitation of liability under secs. 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, observed (per the Lord President),—"Where no question is raised as to the right of petitioners to have their liability limited, and where the ship, as it were, tables its stake, then such expenses as are given against the petitioners over and above the limited fund must be restricted to the expenses of lodging the claims and taking decree, and not extended to any expenses incurred in the competition between the claimants. Kennedys v. Clyde Shipping Co., Limited, June 5, 1908, p. 895.

Freightment—Charter-Party—Time Charter—Warranty of Seaworthiness—Separate Voyages.

Under a time charter-party a steamer was hired by the owners to the charterers for a period of six months from September 1905, "she being then tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the service," the owners being bound to "provide and pay for the necessary equipment for the proper and efficient working of the said steamer, maintaining her in a thoroughly efficient state for and during the service." On 28th November 1905 a breakdown of machinery occurred while the vessel was on a voyage from Jaffa to Valencia, necessitating her going to a port for repairs. This breakdown was due to defects which were in existence before the vessel left Jaffa on 20th November. Held that the owners' obligation at common law and under the charter-party was to hand over the vessel in a seaworthy condition at the commencement of the hiring, and to maintain her in that condition by defraying whatever expenses were necessary for repairs; but that there was no warranty, either express or implied, that she should be seaworthy at the commencement of each particular voyage or stage of a voyage during the currency of the charter, so as to entitle the charterers, on the ground of breach of implied warranty, to refuse payment of the hire for the voyage between Jaffa and the place where the breakdown was remedied. Giertsen v. Turnbull & Co., July 9, 1908, p. 1101.

Affreightment—Charter-Party—Breakdown—Date of Commencement.

12. A time charter-party provided "that in the event of loss of time from . . . breakdown of machinery . . . the payment of hire shall cease from the time the breakdown occurred until "the vessel "be again in an efficient state to resume her service." In the course of a voyage the vessel left a port with defects in her machinery which at first did not impede her progress, but which gradually became more serious, and ultimately necessitated her going to a harbour for repairs. Held that the breakdown occurred at the point of time when the defects became so serious as to render it necessary, in the opinion of a prudent navigator, that she should proceed to a harbour for repairs. Giertsen v. Turnbull & Co., July 9, 1908, p. 1101.

13. A clause in a time charter-party provided that the charterers of the vessel should pay for the coals used during the currency of the charter. The charter-party expressly provided that the payment of hire should cease during breakdowns. Held that the charterers were bound to pay for the coals used during periods of breakdown. Giertsen v. Turnbull & Co., July 9, 1908, p. 1101.

Affreightment—Unloading of vessel—As fast as steamer can deliver—Charges necessary for quick dispatch—Liability of consignee.

14. A bill of lading for sugar shipped from the West Indies to Greenock contained this provision:—"The goods to be received by the consignee from the ship's tackles as fast as the steamer can deliver, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding, and all charges incurred after being discharged necessary for the steamer's quick dispatch to be paid by the owner or consignee of the goods." Held that under this condition the ship was entitled to put the cargo out on to the quay as fast as she could; that the consignees, provided they had fair notice of the intended rate of discharge, were bound, whatever might be the custom of the port as to taking delivery, to make arrangements for having the cargo removed as fast as it was put out; and that if they had failed to do so, and so caused a block on the quay, which interrupted the discharge, the ship was entitled to employ men to clear the block, and to recover the expense of doing so from the consignees. Crown S.S. Co., Limited, v. Leitch, Jan. 31, 1908, p. 506.

Affreightment—Lay-days—Commencement—"Time for discharging to commence on being reported at custom-house"—Ship reported before being berthed.

15. By a charter-party it was provided that a vessel, after loading a cargo at Middlesborough, "should proceed to Savona or Genoa as ordered, . . . and there deliver the same, . . . time for discharging to commence on being reported at the custom-house." The vessel having been ordered to Savona, anchored in the roads there on a Tuesday morning, and was reported at the custom-house at 3 P.M. on that day, but had to wait until a later date before she could get into the harbour, and until a still later date before she got into the berth where she discharged her cargo. In an action for demurrage it was admitted that the roads were outside the geographical limits of the port of Savona and of what was known commercially as the port, and were the ordinary place at which vessels lay until there should be room in the harbour, where alone discharging could be effected. The pursuers averred "that according to the custom of the port, vessels on arrival in the roads are reported at the custom-house, and allotted berths in the harbour according to the order of reporting." Held that, assuming the pursuers' averment to be accurate, the time which under the charter-party the lay-days began was 3 P.M. on Tuesday, the hour of reporting at the custom-house, although the vessel had not then arrived at a place in the harbour where she could discharge. Horsley Line, Limited, v. Roechling Brothers, May 1, 1908, p. 866.

Eightment—Lay-days—Demurrage—Computation—Whole days or fractions.

charter-party provided "cargo to be received at the port of discharge at the rate of 400 tons per weather working day . . . demurrage at the rate of £25 per running day." The cargo was 350 tons. Held (1) that the charterers were only entitled to lay-days amounting to seven days and three hours (the time actually required for unloading the cargo at the specified rate) and not, as they contended, to eight complete days; (2) that the vessel having been on demurrage for a period of six days and one and a half hours of a seventh day, the owners were only entitled to demurrage for six days and one and a half hours, and not, as they contended, for seven complete days. Horsley Line, Limited, v. Roechling Brothers, May 29, 1908, p. 866.

Eightment—Lay-days—Demurrage—Exception—Hands striking work—Regulations of Co-operative Societies of Labour.

Under a charter-party, dated January 1907, the charterers were bound to discharge cargo at a certain rate per day, "except in cases of riot, or any hands striking work." For a certain period after her arrival in the port of discharge, the ship lay stern on to a quay until a berth became available at which she could lie broadside on. No cargo was discharged during this period, owing to a declaration of the presidents of the two co-operative societies of labour at the port that steamers were not to be discharged while moored end on to a quay. This declaration was published in November 1906, and was widely known and regularly acted upon. Held that this delay did not fall within the exception, and that the time during which the ship lay stern on to the quay must be counted in reckoning lay-days and demurrage. Horsley Line, Limited, v. Roechling Brothers, May 29, 1908, p. 866.

Salvage—Services rendered under contract.

Services rendered by one vessel to another in distress are not "salvage" services unless voluntarily rendered. The Clan Steam Trawling Co., Limited, v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited, Feb. 25, 1908, p. 651.

One vessel assisted another in distress. Both vessels were insured in the same mutual insurance company, under policies which contained a condition that any vessel insured in the company should if necessary render assistance to any other vessel insured in the same company. Held that the services rendered, being contractual and obligatory, were not "salvage" services entitling the owners of the vessel rendering them to "salvage" remuneration. The Clan Steam Trawling Co., Limited, v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co., Limited, Feb. 25, 1908, p. 651.

same town, F. brought an action against M. for decree for £150. The pursuer averred that the defender had as part of the agreement undertaken not to compete with the pursuer in business in the town, under a penalty of £150. The pursuer produced a document, dated 26th August 1904, signed by the parties, which the pursuer alleged set forth the terms of the agreement. This document bore a sixpenny agreement stamp. The defender pleaded that the document being a conveyance on sale within the meaning of sec. 54 of the Stamp Act, 1891, required an ad valorem stamp. Held that, having regard to the fact that there was a prior verbal agreement to sell followed by possession, the document was not so clearly a conveyance on sale as to make it the duty of the Court, under sec. 14 of the Stamp Act, 1891, to require the document to be stamped with an ad valorem stamp before allowing it to be admitted in evidence. Don Francesco v. De Meo, Oct. 18, 1907, p. 7.

2. Held that the provisions of sec. 12 (b) of the Finance Act, 1895, were not limited to the case of a statutory confirmation of a provisional agreement to purchase, but applied to a purchase of property by a railway company in pursuance of compulsory powers contained in a special Act of the company. Lord Advocate v. Caledonian Railway Co., Feb. 19, 1908, p. 566.
3. Held that a conveyance which had been produced at the collector's office in order to be provisionally marked with the duty payable, and had thereafter been stamped with that duty, had not been "produced to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue duly stamped" in the sense of sec. 12 of the Finance Act, 1895. Lord Advocate v. Caledonian Railway Co., Feb. 19, 1908, p. 566.
4. Held that the date of the "completion of the purchase" in the sense of sec. 12 of the Finance Act, 1895, was the date of the final payment of the price. Lord Advocate v. Caledonian Railway Co., Feb. 19, 1908, p. 566.

SUCCESSION. Testament—Construction—Subject of Gift—Words importing gift of heritage—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 20.

1. A testator by holograph will appointed executors, and instructed them after paying his debts to divide the income of "the balance" between his brother and sister equally, and on the death of either to pay the whole income to the survivor; on the death of both "I wish my whole estate realised and equally divided between my cousins on my mother's side." The testator left about £3300 of moveable property, and also had a personal right to a share (valued at under £100) of a small heritable property. Held that the heritable property was carried by the will. Copland's Executors v. Milne, Jan. 16, 1908, p. 426.
2. A testator by his will, dated in 1905, appointed an executor whom he directed to realise "all my estate," and to pay certain legacies. He further directed that "the residue of my estate," after payment of the legacies, should be divided among his family. The testator died possessed of both heritable and moveable property. Held that the heritable property had been validly conveyed by the will to the executor, and that he had power to sell the same. Jack's Executor v. Downie, March 7, 1908, p. 718.
3. Terms of a holograph testament containing the expressions "Everything else to be sold" and "I leave the remainder," which were held sufficient to import a bequest of heritage. Crowe v. Cook, July 17, 1908, p. 1178.

Testament—Construction—Subject of Gift—"Carriage"—Motor-Car.

4. The proprietor of an estate died in January 1907 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated in 1890. In it he directed his trustees to make over his landed estate to his wife, and with certain small exceptions his whole "furniture and plenishing, including books, plate, pictures, jewellery, ornaments, and bed and table linen, and also my horses and carriages, live stock, plants, and garden and stable implements." At the date of his settlement the testator had carriages and horses, but subsequently he sold these and bought two motor-cars, which he possessed at the time of his death, Held that the bequest of carriages included the motor-cars. Denholm's Trustees v Denholm, Oct. 29, 1907, p. 43.

Testament—Construction—Subject of Gift—Power to consume—Gift over of portion unconsumed.

5. In a mutual settlement by spouses the husband conveyed his whole estates to trustees and directed them to pay to his wife, if she survived him, as an alimentary allowance for her and their children, the income of his estate and such portions of the capital as his trustees should deem necessary; "and in like manner and in consideration of what is above written," the wife conveyed her whole estates to her husband under the burden of maintaining her whole children, with full power to him "to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary," and also power "to realise . . . said estates . . . and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as" she could have done herself. She appointed him to be her sole executor. Upon the death of her husband if he survived her (as he did), she conveyed her "said estate or such portion thereof as may be unconsumed" by him to trustees for certain purposes. The wife died in 1893. After the wife's death the husband realised certain properties which had belonged to her and paid the proceeds into his own bank account, so that they became immixed with his own funds, and could not ultimately be traced or identified. The husband died in 1905. In an action by the wife's trustees against the trustees under a will left by the husband, held (1) that under the mutual settlement the husband was not bound to account for his intromissions with his wife's estate, and that consequently his trustees were not bound so to account; (2) that the onus of proving what part of the wife's estate was unconsumed by the husband was upon the pursuers; and (3) that the proceeds of the wife's properties sold by the husband having been immixed with the husband's funds, and being now incapable of identification, must be held to have been consumed by the husband in the sense of the mutual settlement. Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm's Trustees, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 255.

Testament—Construction—Object of Gift—"Cousins."

6. The word "cousins" in a testamentary deed means first cousins only, unless there is something in the context of the deed or in the circumstances of the case to shew that the word is used in a different sense. Copland's Executors v. Milne, Jan. 16, 1908, p. 426.
7. Legacy—Specific Legacies—Specific or general. Maclean v. Maclean's Executrix, May 23, 1908, p. 838.

Destination—Liferent and Fee—Fiduciary Fee.

8. The creditor in a heritable bond bequeathed it by direct disposition to certain persons in liferent and in fee to the heir of entail who might be in possession of certain lands at the expiry of the liferenta. Opinion (per the Lord President) that there was no effectual destination of the fee, and that the purpose of the testator could only have been achieved by the interposition of a trust. Observed, "I have never heard—and I do not think we ought to extend the doctrine—of the doctrine of a fiduciary fee for somebody who is neither a child nor an heir in any sense of the person in whom the fiduciary fee is created." Colville's Trustees v. Marindin, June 6, 1908, p. 911.

Accretion—Liferent.

9. A testator directed his trustees to hold a certain part of the residue of his estate "for behoof of my son John, his wife, and family, for alimentary use, not alienable or assignable or attachable for his or their debts (and afterwards to their issue in fee), and the annual proceeds arising therefrom to be paid quarterly to those entitled to receive the same." After the death of John and his wife and of one of his two children, held that the bequest was a bequest of a joint liferent, and that John's surviving child was entitled to the liferent of the whole fund. Napier's Trustees v. Napier, July 14, 1908, p. 1160.

10. Observed, per Lord M'Laren,—"A bequest to a plurality of persons for life is in law a joint bequest, unless (1) there are words of severance, such as 'in equal shares,' or (2) the bequest is capable of being construed as a family provision under which the issue of each liferenter takes the parent's original share." Napier's Trustees v. Napier, July 14, 1908, p. 1160.

Conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit—Nephews and Nieces—Conditional Institution—Specific Legacy.

11. By her general trust-disposition and settlement a testatrix, who had no children, but had three sets of nephews and nieces, directed her trustees, inter alia, to invest £2500 for behoof of her niece Christina Black in liferent and her children in fee, and failing such children to pay it as follows:—To her own nephew George Black £1000, to her niece Jane Black £750, and to her nephew Charles Boswell Black £750: "Declaring that if the said Christina Black shall predecease me the said sum of £2500 shall form part of the residue of my estate." The Blacks mentioned were the whole family of a sister of the testatrix. To each of the testatrix's nephews and nieces was bequeathed a share of the residue. Christina Black survived the testatrix and died without issue. Jane Black predeceased the testatrix, leaving a son, who survived the testatrix and Christina, the liferentrix. Held that the conditional bequest of £750 to Jane Black could not be regarded as a family provision, and therefore that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit did not apply. Allan v. Thomson's Trustees, Jan. 24, 1908, p. 483.

Fee and Liferent—Mines and Minerals—Rent of mineral field opened after testator's death.

12. The proprietor of the estate of W., who died in 1848, by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to divide the annual income of his whole estates, heritable and moveable, among certain of his relatives, and their issue in succession, with further substitutions, and on the death of all these beneficiaries to convey the fee of his whole estates to the person who should then be the heir-male of his, the testator's father. The estate of W. contained coal, which down to the date of the testator's death had never been worked, and his trust-disposition and settlement did not contain any reference to coal. In 1907 the trustees let the coal in W. for a fixed rent or lordships. The mineral tenants did not at first begin operations for opening up the coalfield, and in consequence they paid the fixed rent to the trustees. In a special case, held that the fixed rent or lordships, whether the coal was being worked or not, represented part of the corpus of the estate, and being thus capital and not income, did not fall to be paid to the beneficiaries in right of the income, and that the fixed rent or lordships fell to be retained by the trustees for behoof of the person ultimately found to be entitled to a conveyance of the fee of the estate. Ranken's Trustees v. Ranken, Oct. 17, 1907, p. 3.

Conditions and Directions—Impossibility of literal fulfilment.

13. A testator directed his trustees to realise and divide the residue of his estate among his children equally, "declaring . . . that the term of the vesting of the foregoing provisions of residue shall, as regards daughters, be on their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall happen first: As regards said provisions to my daughters, I hereby appoint that the capital of the same shall not be paid to them (except as after mentioned), but that my trustees shall pay to my daughters the revenue of their respective provisions while they remain unmarried, and on their marriage my trustees shall see to it that the said provisions, both revenue and capital, be secured in trust . . . by antenuptial settlement upon my daughters and their children to be born . . . Further, notwithstanding what is before written, my trustees shall have power on the marriage of such daughter to pay to her, or to pay to any daughter already married at my death, for her own absolute use, such portion (not exceeding one-tenth part) of the capital of her provision as my trustees shall think proper." The testator was survived by two married daughters, whose marriages took place before the date of the settlement. In a special case these daughters maintained that they were entitled to immediate payment of their respective shares of residue on the ground that the direction to secure by "antenuptial contract" being inapplicable to the case of daughters who were already married was ineffectual to burden the initial gift of fee and fell to be disregarded. Held that the testator's intention that the shares of the daughters, married as well as unmarried, should be secured to them and their children being sufficiently plain, that intention was not to be defeated simply because he had indicated a method of carrying out his wishes which was not precisely applicable to every case, and that the trustees were bound (subject to the power to advance) to settle the shares of daughters, married at the date of the testator's death, in trust in names of the trustees or of other trustees for the daughters' behoof in liferent and otherwise as directed by the testator. Fyfe's Trustees v. Duthie, Jan. 31, 1908, p. 520.

Conditions and Directions—Directions to purchase annuities—Right of beneficiary to payment of the capital—Government Annuities.

14. A testator directed his executor or his trustees to invest certain sums in the purchase of annuities in the name and for the benefit of certain persons. He further provided: "And I declare that all annuities . . . shall be purchased by him or them from the British Government or from the Scottish Widows' Insurance Company, Limited, of Edinburgh, in Scotland, and any other first-class company or annuity office as my said executor or . . . trustees shall in this behalf think fit." There was no declaration that the annuities were to be alimentary, but Government annuities, purchased under the Government Annuities Act, 1853, are not assignable except on the insolvency or bankruptcy of the annuitant. The beneficiaries having called on the trustees to pay over the principal sums instead of investing them in the purchase of annuities, held that the beneficiaries were entitled to payment of the principal sums. Turner's Trustees v. Fernie, May 30, 1908, p. 883.

Conditions and Directions—Accumulation—Rent of mineral field opened after testator's death—Thellusson Act.

15. Thellusson Act held not to apply to accumulations of fixed rents of a mineral field opened after the testator's death. Ranken's Trustees v. Ranken, Oct. 17, 1907, p. 3.

Vesting—Initial gift of fee to daughters—Subsequent directions to secure daughters' shares for behoof of daughters and their respective children.

16. A testator directed his trustees to realise and divide the residue of his estate among his children equally, "declaring that the term of the vesting of the foregoing provisions of residue shall, as regards daughters, be on their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall happen first: As regards said provisions to my daughters, I hereby appoint that the capital of the same shall not be paid to them . . . but that my trustees shall pay to my daughters the revenue of their respective provisions while they remain unmarried; and on their marriage my trustees shall see to it that the said provisions, both revenue and capital, be secured in trust . . . by antenuptial settlement upon my daughters and their children to be born, in usual form, the husbands of my said daughters (if my said daughters shall so desire) to have a liferent only, postponed to my said daughters' liferent." There was no destination over in the event of a daughter dying after the period of vesting without leaving children. The testator was survived by daughters who had attained majority. Held (1) that a right to a share in the fee had vested in each daughter burdened with a trust for the purpose of securing to her the income of her share during her life, and the capital to her children who should survive her; and therefore (2) that on the death of a daughter without leaving children her share would be carried by her will if she left one, and if not would pass to her heirs ab intestata. Fyfe's Trustees v. Duthie, Jan. 31, 1908, p. 520.

Vesting—Vesting subject to Defeasance—Conditional Institution of Issue—Direction to divide at postponed period—Power to advance meantime.

Ademption—Special Legacy—Specific Bequest of Heritage—Sale of Subject—Suspensive Condition.

8. A testator by his will bequeathed to his daughter, as a special legacy, a hotel of which he was the proprietor. Shortly before his death the testator sold the hotel to William Steven, and signed a minute of sale which bore that "it shall be a condition of this agreement being binding on both parties that Mr Steven applies for and obtains a transfer of the licence certificate of the said hotel." The transfer was not obtained until after the death of the testator, and thereafter a formal conveyance was executed in favour of the purchaser, and the price paid. In a special case the question was put whether the bequest of the hotel had been adeemed. Held that the contract of sale being subject to a suspensive condition—namely, the transfer of the licence—the hotel remained part of the testator's estate at his death, and accordingly that the legacy had not been adeemed, and that the price of the hotel belonged to the daughter. Opinions that even if there had been no suspensive condition there had been no ademption, the hotel, or the right to its price, remaining part of the testator's estate. M'Arthur's Executors v. Guild, March 11, 1908, p. 743.

Ademption.

19. By a general disposition and settlement a testatrix bequeathed her whole estate to her daughter F., "with the exception of £300 sterling of mine which my son A. has invested for me, and which I do hereby leave and bequeath to himself." At the date of the settlement A. had in his possession a sum of £300 belonging to his mother on which he paid interest to her. This sum he subsequently repaid to her before her death. Held that the legacy to A. was a specific legacy of a sum of £300 in his hands at the date of the settlement, and that as there was no sum in his hands at the death of the testatrix the legacy must be held to have been adeemed. Maclean v. Maclean's Executrix, May 23, 1908, p. 838.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Feu-duty—Recovery of arrears—Vassal a company—Action by superior for sequestration for feu-duty after Liquidation—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 163.

Held that an action by a superior against his vassal, a limited company in liquidation, for sequestration of the moveables on the feu for arrears of feu-duty, was not an "attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution" within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1862, sec. 163. Anderson's Trustees v. Donaldson & Co., Limited (in Liquidation), Oct. 26, 1907, p. 38.

TEINDS. Minister's Stipend—Augmentation—Augmentation of seven chalders.

The minister of a parish applied for an augmentation of seven chalders. There had been no augmentation for fifty-nine years, and it appeared that the previous minister, who had occupied the benefice for fifty-six years, had been possessed of considerable private means. All the heritors assented to the augmentation. In the circumstances the Court granted an augmentation of seven chalders. Minister of Dalsersf v. Heritors, July 10, 1908, p. 1123.

TITLE TO SUE AND DEFEND. Right to compel provision of education—Pupil Child or Parent—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 1—Education (Scotland) Act, 1901, sec. 1.

1. The Education (Scotland) Acts confer no right upon a child to compel a school board to provide him with education. Sinclair v. Moulin School Board, March 17, 1908, p. 772.

2. Observed that the only person entitled to bring an action against a school board to compel them to provide a child with education is the parent (as defined by the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 1). Sinclair v. Moulin School Board, March 17, 1908, p. 772.

Executor—Dependant's Executor—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule, (1) (a) (i.).

3. Held that the right to compensation, conferred by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, on the dependant of a deceased workman, vests in the dependant on the death of the workman, and transmits to the representatives of the dependant, although the dependant may have made no claim for compensation during his lifetime. Hendry v. United Collieries, Limited, July 18, 1908, p. 1215.

Informers—Game—Partridges Act, 1799.

4. Held that the Partridges Act, 1799, did not give a title to a private individual, as informer, to prosecute for a penalty under the Act, and that the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal did not supply the defect in the instance. M'Douall v. Irvine, Nov. 2, 1907, p. 60.

Procurator-Fiscal—Game—Partridges Act, 1799.

5. Question whether the procurator-fiscal had a title to prosecute for a penalty under the Partridges Act, 1799. M'Douall v. Irvine, Nov. 2, 1907, p. 60.

TITLE TO SUE AND DEFEND—Continued.Tenant—River—Pollution.

6. In an action for interdict at the instance of the tenant of a farm to prevent pollution of a stream which flowed through the farm, held that he had a good title to pursue the action. Fleming v. Gemmill, Dec. 20, 1907, p. 340.

Wife and Children of Tenant—Insanitary House.

7. Held that the wife and children of the tenant of a dwelling-house had no title to sue the landlord for damages for loss and injury caused to them by illness due to the insanitary condition of the house. Cameron v. Young, Feb. 27, 1908, (H. L.) p. 7.

Title to Defend—Heritable Office—Title to dispute claim to office.

8. The Earl of Lauderdale raised an action for declarator that he was entitled to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland. He averred that by the Act 1600, cap. 44, the office was confirmed to "Sir James Scrymgeour and his heirs-male," and that the pursuer's predecessors had subsequently acquired right to the office. He called as defender Henry Scrymgeour Wedderburn, who denied the pursuer's right to the office, and, in support of his title to defend the action, averred that he was "heir-male of the Sir James Scrymgeour mentioned in the Act of 1600." Held that the defender had averred a sufficient title to defend the action and to dispute the pursuer's claim, and that it was not necessary for him ante omnia to prove by service that he was the person entitled to the office in the event of the pursuer's claim proving invalid. Earl of Lauderdale v. Wedderburn, July 18, 1908, p. 1237.

1. A tailor, having received a letter from a person who stated that he wanted "a suit of Scotch tweeds," and asked for "patterns of good stuff—all wool," sent certain patterns of cloth, some of which were Scotch tweed all wool and some of which were not, enclosed in a letter, which stated—"Enclosed please find patterns as desired." The customer chose two patterns, and from the cloth chosen, to which they referred, the tailor made him a suit of clothes. The cloth did not conform to the description "Scotch Tweed All Wool," as defined by the trade. Held that, even assuming that sec. 2 (2) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, applies to a false trade description not affixed to the goods by a stamp or label, no false description had been "applied" in the sense of sec. 2 (2) of that Act by the seller in this case. Question whether the application of sec. 2 (2) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, is not limited to cases where a person sells, or exposes for or has in his possession for sale, goods on which a false description is stamped or attached by label. H. M. Advocate v. Jacob, July 16, 1908, (J.) p. 90.
2. A person acting at the instigation of a procurator-fiscal wrote to the Glasgow branch of a firm of clothiers, asking for patterns of "Scotch Tweed" waterproofs, and saying,—“What I want is a good serviceable coat, all wool.” The firm wrote, enclosing patterns “as requested.” One of these patterns, which did not answer to the trade description “Scotch Tweed All Wool,” was chosen, and the firm supplied a coat of the material selected. It appeared that the firm’s assistants were enjoined not to give goods any description other than that by which they were invoiced to the branch. The material in question was invoiced to the branch as “overcoating,” and by the rules of the business the firm's salesmen were permitted to supply it only under the name of "overcoating." Held (per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Low, and Lord Ardwall) that the trade description "Scotch Tweed All Wool" had not been "applied," in the sense of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, sec. 2 (2), to the material in question; and (per the Court) that even if the trade description "Scotch Tweed All Wool" had been applied to the material, the respondents had acted innocently in the sense of sec. 2 (2) of that Act. H. M. Advocate v. Suits, Limited, July 16, 1908, p. 1163.

3. Observations on the conduct incumbent upon persons seeking evidence to support prosecutions under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, by making purchases for that purpose. H. M. Advocate v. Suits, Limited, July 16, 1908, p. 1163.

TRUST. Nature and Constitution—Gift in will of power to consume—Gift over of portion unconsumed.

1. In a mutual settlement by spouses the wife conveyed her whole estates to her husband under the burden of maintaining her whole children, with full power to him "to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary," and also power "to realise . . . said estates . . . and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as" she could have done herself. She appointed him to be her sole executor. Upon the death of her husband if he survived her (as he did), she conveyed her "said estate or such portion thereof as may be unconsumed" by him to trustees for certain purposes. In an action by the wife's trustees against the trustees under a will left by the husband, held that under the mutual settlement the husband was not bound to account for his intromissions with his wife's estate, and that consequently his trustees were not bound so to account. Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm's Trustees, Nov. 29, 1907, p. 255.

Control—Removal of Trustee—Appointment of New Trustees.

2. It is within the power of the Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium, to appoint new trustees in room of a sole trustee removed from office. Lamont v. Lamont, June 30, 1908, p. 1033.

Administration—Investment of Funds—Power to retain Investments—Company Shares—Uncalled Liability.

3. A power given by a testator to his trustees to "hold any investments" he "may die possessed of for such time as they may think fit," entitles the trustees to retain shares in public companies upon which there is an uncalled liability, but only so long as they are satisfied of the safety of the shares as a trust investment, and in the exercise of the power the trustees must act with prudence. Boyd's Trustees v. Boyd, July 11, 1908, p. 1147.

Administration—Investment of Funds—Liability of Trustees—Local Authorities Loans Stock—Purchase at Premium—Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891, sec. 44 (2).

4. Testamentary trustees, who held funds for behoof of different persons as liferenter and fiar respectively, in 1897 invested part of these funds in a redeemable stock issued under the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891, at the price of £102 per cent, being £2 per cent more than the redemption value. They at the same time entered into an arrangement with the liferenter whereby he undertook to repay to the trust this £2 per cent of excess cost. On the death of the liferenter this £2 per cent of excess cost had been paid back to the trustees, but at that time the stock stood in the market at 10 per cent below its redemption value. Held that as the stock had been purchased at a price beyond its redemption value, contrary to sec. 44 (2) of the Local Authorities Loans Act, 1891, the investment was ultra vires of the trustees, and that the arrangement whereby the excess cost was to be repaid to the trust by the life-renter did not make the investment lawful. Held further, that as the investment was ultra vires the trustees were personally liable to restore to the trust the difference between the redemption value of the stock and the amount which it might yield on being realised. Beveridge's Trustee v. Beveridge, March 17, 1908, p. 791.

Administration—Power to limit interest of beneficiaries—Gift of whole or portion of annual income according to trustees' discretion.

5. A testator directed his trustees to invest in their own names, as trustees, a sum of £5000, and to pay to A B during his lifetime "either the whole or only a portion of the annual revenue thereof, and that subject to such conditions and restrictions, all as my trustees in their sole and absolute discretion think fit," and, on the decease of A B, to pay "said sum of £5000, with any revenue accrued thereon that has not been paid to" A B, to A B's children, declaring that in the event of A B dying without children, "said sum of £5000 and accumulations of revenue, if any," should form part of the residue of his estate. The testator died in June 1899. A B was the testator's sole next of kin, and in 1903 he assigned to X, in security of a debt of £650, his interest in the deceased's estate as next of kin and as a legatee. In August 1904 an action was raised by X as assignee of A B against the trustees concluding for payment of the income of the £5000. The pursuer maintained that the defenders—who had since the testator's death paid only certain trifling sums to A B from time to time—were bound to have exercised their discretion annually as to the amount of the income of the £5000 to be paid to A B, and in respect that they had failed to do so, were bound to make payment of the whole income thereof that had accrued since the date of the testator's death, under deduction of the sums paid to A B. The First Division held that the payments to be made to A B were left by the testator entirely in the discretion of the trustees, and that in the circumstances the trustees had done nothing to entitle the Court to interfere with their discretion, and assailed the defenders. In an appeal the House affirmed the judgment. Train v. Clapperton, May 25, 1908, (H. L.) p. 26.

Administration—Trustee—Disabilities—Judicial Factor's firm acting as law-agents—Fees paid by borrowers of trust funds.

6. A partner in a firm of law-agents was appointed judicial factor on a trust-estate. He lent part of the factory funds on heritable security to clients of the firm. The usual fees were paid to the firm by the borrowers in accordance with the table of fees. Held that the factor was not bound to communicate to the factory estate the fees paid by the borrowers to his firm. Sleigh v. Sleigh's Judicial Factor, July 9, 1908, p. 1112.

Administration—Trustee—Disabilities—Judicial Factor's firm acting as law-agents for beneficiaries.

7. A partner in a firm of law-agents was appointed judicial factor on a trust-estate. The firm did legal work on the employment of the beneficiaries' guardians, and of the beneficiaries themselves after they had attained majority. The work was done in connection with the disbursement of the factory income to the beneficiaries, and also in connection with the preparation of deeds rendered necessary in consequence of certain beneficiaries having applied for an advance of capital. For these services the firm charged fees and commission against the beneficiaries. Held that the factor was not bound to UNDUE INFLUENCE. Paramour—Testament—Reduction.

Held that the relation existing between a man and a woman, who had lived with him as his mistress, was not of such a character as to support a plea of undue influence in an action for reduction of a will, by which he left the bulk of his property to her and their illegitimate son, to the detriment of his legitimate family. M'Kechnie v. M'Kechnie's Trustees, Oct. 30, 1907, p. 93.

VALUATION ACTS. Subjects—"Lands and Heritages"—Slag Heap—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 42.

1. A large slag heap, owned by trustees and deposited on ground belonging to them, was let to a railway company under a lease by which the company had, on payment of a royalty or fixed rent, right to remove and use the slag for the purposes of their railway. Held that the slag heap was a heritable subject, and that the trustees and the railway company had rightly been entered in the Valuation-roll as respectively the proprietors and the tenants thereof. Airdrie, Coatbridge, and District Water Trustees v. Assessor for Lanarkshire, Feb. 19, 1908, p. 596.

Value—Subject unlet—Principle of Valuation—Revenue Principle—Whether income to be taken on an average of years.

2. In valuing a gas company's undertaking the Assessor adopted the "revenue" principle, and took as the revenue the average income for the preceding five years, in one of which the income was exceptionally large. Held that the Assessor had rightly estimated the income by taking an average of years; that five years was a fair period to average; and that the circumstance that the income for one of the five years was exceptionally large was not a ground for treating the case exceptionally. Melrose Gas Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Roxburghshire, Feb. 20, 1908, p. 600.

Value—Subject unlet—Principle of Valuation—Harbour.

3. In 1863 it was held by the Court of Session that the Clyde Navigation Trustees were not assessable as proprietors of the waterways of the port and harbour of Glasgow, the incorporeal right of harbour not being vested in them, and that they were assessable only as proprietors of the wharfs, quays, and other structures in the harbour. In 1866 the Valuation Appeal Judges in fixing the yearly value of the undertaking of the Clyde Trustees gave effect to the judgment of the Court of Session by deducting from the dues payable to the trustees a proportion as being applicable to the waterways of the port and harbour. The undertaking continued to be valued on that basis for more than forty years. In 1908 the Assessor for Lanarkshire proposed to value the portion of the undertaking within the county either (a) on the basis of taking into account the whole or a much larger proportion of the dues paid to the trustees, or (b) on the "contractor's" principle, i.e., by taking a percentage on the structural cost of the quays, &c. Held (a) that there was no such change of circumstances as to warrant a change in the method of dealing with the dues, and (b) that the contractor's method was inapplicable. Assessor for Lanarkshire v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, March 4, 1908, p. 620.

Value—Subject unlet—Shop in occupation of proprietor—Valuation by comparison with rent of neighbouring shops let—Valuation by floorage area—Re-valuation where no change of circumstances.

4. Jenner & Co. were the owners and occupiers of a large block of buildings in Edinburgh fronting Princes Street on the south, St David Street on the east, and Rose Street on the north. The whole buildings were occupied in connection with Jenner & Co.'s business of drapers, &c., the main floors being used as shops and saloons, and the upper floors as workrooms and a boarding residence for the employees. The building had been recently erected, and down to 1907 it was entered in the Valuation-roll at the yearly rent or value of £7250. In 1907 the Assessor entered the buildings at £8780, a sum reached by taking the floorage area of each floor and applying thereto a varying rate per square foot, the rates being based upon an analysis of rents actually paid for neighbouring shops in Princes Street. Jenner & Co. appealed and maintained that the re-valuation was not justified by any change of circumstances. The Magistrates reduced the valuation to £8000. Held that the Magistrates were wrong, and that the valuation should be reduced to £7250. Jenner & Co. v. Assessor for Edinburgh, Feb. 21, 1908, p. 601.

Value—Subject unlet—Insurance Office—No similar office in same street—Valuation by comparison with shops.

5. A large recently built office in Princes Street, Edinburgh, belonging to and occupied by an insurance company was entered by the Assessor at £5500, a sum reached by taking the floorage area, and applying thereto varying rates per square foot, the rates being derived from an analysis of rents actually paid for shops in Princes Street. There was no similar insurance office in Princes Street. The Company appealed and maintained that the valuation ought to be on the basis of the valuation of other insurance offices in Edinburgh, e.g., in George Street or St Andrew Square. The Magistrates reduced the valuation to £5000. On appeal the Judges declined to interfere with the determination of the Magistrates, as it was not shewn to be unreasonable. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co. v. Assessor for Edinburgh, Feb. 21, 1908, p. 601.

Value—Subject unlet—Spinning Mills—Estimated capital value—Criterion of value—Recent sales of similar property in vicinity.

6. In fixing the capital value of spinning mills, in the occupation of their owners, as the basis for reaching the yearly rent or value of the mills, it is legitimate to take into consideration the prices obtained at a number of recent sales of these and similar mills in the same town. Webster & Sons v. Assessor for Arbroath, March 4, 1908, p. 613.

Procedure—Appeal—Appeal against recent valuation by the Judges—New Evidence.

7. In 1902 the Lands Valuation Appeal Judges fixed the yearly value of the Alma Spinning Mill, Arbroath (occupied by the owners) at £1293, and in succeeding years the Assessor continued to enter the mill at that sum. In 1907 the owners appealed against the entry, and adduced evidence that since 1900 nearly all the similar mills in Arbroath had been sold, and at prices which shewed that the Assessor's valuation of these mills was over 50 per cent too high. The Valuation Committee (with the exception of £130, which they allowed for depreciation) confirmed the Assessor's valuation on the ground that there was no change of circumstances since the value was fixed in 1902. Held by the Judges, on appeal, that the evidence (which was not before the Court in 1902) as to the recent sales of other mills justified a reconsideration of the value of the mill in ques-WARRANTICE. Eviction—Expenses of unsuccessful action to prevent eviction.

The Magistrates and Councillors of the burgh of Dunfermline let a farm, part of the Common Good, bounded on one side by a stream and loch, to A, reserving the privilege of fishing “by themselves or others having written authority from them,” and granted absolute warrantice. A subsequently complained to the lessors that he had sustained partial eviction by anglers, who had no written authority from the lessors, invading the banks of the stream and loch. The lessors having declined to take action, A raised an action for interdict against B and others, who had used the banks for angling without written authority from the lessors. The Lord Ordinary found that the defenders, as members of the community and ratepayers in the burgh, had right to use the banks for the purpose, and refused interdict. This judgment was not reclaimed against. In an action subsequently raised by A against the lessors, the Lord Ordinary held (1) that A had sustained partial eviction, and was entitled to an abatement of rent, and (2) that A was entitled to payment of the expenses incurred by him, and those for which he had been found liable in the action for interdict. The defenders having reclaimed against the judgment on the second point, the Court adhered. Dougall v. Magistrates of Dunfermline, Nov. 20, 1907, p. 151.
